Wonderfully Attractive Announcement Slides

American Slide & Poster Co., 1st National Bank Bldg., Chicago

The Trade Mark of the Largest Electrical Manufacturer in The World.

The Attraction of Good Light

Good, brilliant illumination has an immense "pulling" power. To have two or three flaming arcs outside your theatre attracts the crowd.

Good light also shows up the signs and gives your place a cheery, inviting appearance.

A well lighted exterior is one of your most telling advertisements.

The Long Life Flame Arc Lamp Type W

is one of the most powerful lighting units known. It is especially adapted to illuminating the exteriors of theatres. This efficient lamp is economical to install and maintain—one set of carbons burns for 100-120 hours without attention: and only one of these carbons needs renewing at each trim.

The lamp is thoroughly reliable and substantially constructed.

Write to our local office nearest you for further information.

WHEN DARKNESS CAME

RELEASED TUESDAY, JULY 22

She was the belle of the office and all the clerks paid her court. Even the son of the boss took her out in his automobile; indeed, she received so much attention that she did not know the chief clerk loved her. He never made a display of his affections, but in the show-down, when darkness came, he proved that his quiet love was the truest love of all.

THE TOP OF NEW YORK

RELEASED FRIDAY, JULY 25

A girl is in love with an army officer who, in his spare time, instructs her in the signal code. One of the young woman's diversions is to go to the roof of the New York office building, where she is employed, and from that great height observe the wonderful city below. One day, as she enters onto the roof the spring lock of the roof door snaps and a storm comes up. Then she thinks of the code her sweetheart taught her.

2 reels, July 23

A superbly acted drama, featuring an old man and a very clever little girl in heart-stirring scenes

Old Grand-dad and little Mildred Burr are inseparable. Mr. Burr—a widower—marries again, and his wife is a strait-laced, Puritanical woman, opposed to liquor in all forms, and she objects to Grand-dad's quiet little "nips." She nags him till he goes away, and he finally lands in the poorhouse. Mildred finds him there, and a touching scene takes place. Mr. Burr is furious when he learns where his father is, and goes to bring him home. In the meantime a soldier whose life had been saved by Grand-dad on the field of battle is looking for him, and he tells the story—shown in the picture—of Grand-dad's heroism. When they reach the poorhouse they find Grand-dad overcome by the heat, and he passes away, saluting the flag which appears in a vision of delirium.

They escape to an island, which catches fire, and they find it is the storehouse for dynamite. After burlesque melodramatic incidents they are captured as the island blows up.

The constant expressions of appreciation of that thought, heard on every side, were extremely gratifying to those of us who have been striving to leave nothing undone that would make the standard unique in its excellence. It is a pleasure to announce four more multiple features that illustrate this idea perfectly.

Facts and Comments

THE harmony which has heretofore characterized the councils and proceedings of the National League of Exhibitors has now been marred by the secession of half a dozen important States. The delegates from the seceding States intend to set up an organization of their own. It remains to be seen how their attitude at the Convention will strike their home constituencies. A secession at this moment, when the exhibitor was at last coming into his own, is in every way deplorable, and as the representative organ of the industry, we greatly regret it. We have always believed, and are more than ever convinced, that a strong representative organization of the exhibitors of the country is of benefit not only to the exhibitors themselves but to the entire industry. It would have been far better if the differences among the delegates had been compromised. An organization which shows signs of internal weakness is in danger of losing the general respect and confidence of the industry and of the public. We are sincerely sorry for the fact that so little constructive and useful work has been accomplished by this Convention. There are so many great and pressing questions which might have engaged the attention of the delegates to the advantage of the exhibitors.

President Neff has been re-elected by a substantial majority. No one has impugned his personal integrity, and few will deny his abilities as an organizer. He has undoubtedly made some mistakes. He is hopelessly wrong on the question of censorship. He has busied himself with matters which hardly come within the range of an exhibitors' organization. We believe, however, that his motives are good and that he is willing to profit by his mistakes and avoid them in the future. A man at the head of a big and vigorous organization has much to contend with. We earnestly hope that this split in the ranks of the exhibitors is not a permanent one. Mutual concessions, toleration and forbearance and a due regard for the general welfare of the exhibitors ought to make a reconciliation possible.

EXHIBITORS, no less than responsible manufacturers, are suffering from a mushroom growth of "Cheap John features," with which the market is infested just at this time. The demand for good features is greater than ever, and accounts for the distressing fact that these "Cheap Johns" can come in and make money on films which the S. P. C. A. would not permit to be shown to the higher species of animals. We have within the past few weeks seen "features" that were the embodiment of cheapness. They consist of perhaps two or three interiors, a few outdoor scenes, a horrible scenario, actors and actresses who can be hired at laborers' wages and a director who mixes this unwholesome salad until it is a crying offense against the Pure Food Laws.

Incredible as it may seem, these "features" are sold on the State Rights proposition, and often fetch high prices. One of these multiple-reel abominations, which probably did not cost more than a thousand dollars outside of the raw stock, sold for a preposterously high figure in one State alone. It is nothing less than an imposition on the exhibitor and an injustice to the reputable producer, whose reputation and conscience will not allow him to descend to low practices. These "Cheap John" films are not all imported from abroad: some are actually made here. These latter do double harm; for, as a rule, they are exported to Europe and injure the prestige and reputation which at the present time the American-made picture enjoys in every part of the civilized world.

AFTER a safe and sane period our friends of the yellow press have again suffered a relapse. In a recent issue of The New York World, almost two columns are devoted to a description of the evil effects of the picture on a young man who attempted to poison his sweetheart and who blamed the moving picture "for his downfall." The mother of the youth is quoted with approval when she denounces the motion picture as the cause of her son's trouble. The chief of police of the town in which this sad affair occurred is quoted as saying that he will know how to deal "with the moving picture vampires." The relapse of our esteemed contemporary saddens us only for the moment, for we really believe that notwithstanding this "backsliding," the patient is on the road to recovery.

AN ERRATUM.

In the issue dated July 12, we published a notice to the effect that Messrs. Spitz & Nathanson sold their Empire theater at Providence to Charles Williams. This is an error, as the proprietors have leased the house for the summer months only to Mr. Williams, who will give moving picture exhibitions. The Empire will open on September 1 with its regular programme of stock company attractions.

Arms and the Film

By W. Stephen Bush

A KEEN but not unfriendly observer of motion pictures, a good type of the millions to whom the kinematograph is a source of perpetual delight, recently made some timely and useful comments on the too constant and too generous use of modern firearms on the screen. He thought that the number of films built around revolvers, pistols, rifles and guns generally far exceeded the demand, and helped to bring the picture into disrepute.

A little investigation will show that he is entirely right as to the facts. Out of a score of films taken at random from any of the groups of producers, half a dozen give undue prominence to firearms. No account is taken in this estimate of the indiscriminate firing of cowboys, Indians and supers in battle scenes. These latter we have with us always. I only speak now of such subjects in which the weapon itself plays the leading, or one of the leading, parts.

I saw one so-called portrayal of Western life, labeled a "comedy," in which the alleged "fun" hinges on the loading and the unloading of a revolver. Not less than one hundred and fifty feet are taken up with close-range views of the revolver showing the chambers empty, then depicting a hand which fills the chambers with blank cartridges. Later another hand appears on the screen removing the blank cartridges and substituting loaded cartridges. This scene has scarcely passed out of sight when another view of the revolver is shown at close range and we see another hand removing the loaded cartridges and again substituting blanks. This continues in bewildering confusion until the average spectator loses all interest in the picture and the whole thing becomes a problem for an expert in firearms. Instances of the extraction of bullets and the substitution of blanks are of very common occurrence. Then there is the display of huge initials on the butts of revolvers and guns always shown at close range. In this way the innocent owner of the gun is unjustly brought under suspicion and the rest of the reel, ranging from six to eight hundred feet, is devoted to establishing the innocence of the owner, which has, of course, been anticipated long before by every man, woman and child in the audience.

The use of firearms in motion pictures in the fashions just described is really a nuisance. It is the easiest thing to do away with this nuisance. Producers reflect no credit on their own inventive powers, or on the quality of their scenario writers, by indulging these gun and revolver dramas and comedies. They are not giving us a true picture of life, for, as a matter of fact, firearms do not play such an important and all-pervading part in our real existence. The reproach which is constantly leveled at the motion picture, that it exaggerates and distorts instead of giving a faithful portrayal, derives considerable force from this ridiculous and common abuse. Of all mediums of expressions known to mankind none can afford misrepresentation less than the motion picture. We do not find this expert handling of firearms and this constant display of the working of guns on the speaking stage. Happily the weapons are too small to allow much of this foolish maneuver. The raw youths in the gallery for whose special consumption these tricks are arranged cannot see them and thus drink in the dime-novel atmosphere which surrounds their display. It is plainly an abuse of the power of the camera when the producer tries to overcome this difficulty by means of presenting views of the weapons at close range. The possibility of presenting accurate and enlarged views of objects which are important in the development of dramatic action constitutes one of the advantages of the silent over the speaking stage, and it saddens the judicious friends of the motion picture to see this wonderful advantage abused.

A revolver is never a pleasant-looking object at any time: it suggests the wounding or killing of human beings, and is indeed shown on the screen for this very suggestion. It is quite possible that the need of displaying such a weapon at close range may arise from the logical unraveling of a dramatic plot, and in such cases it is permissible. It is not hard to perceive the distinction. A legitimate use of the camera for such a purpose is extremely rare, and certainly represents no such average as we are now compelled to witness on the screen. The revolver for the sake of the drama may be tolerated, but the drama for the sake of the revolver is wholly bad.

The gun and the revolver in the film breed lurid posters in the lobby. There is a wholesome and commendable tendency just now to keep away from flamboyant lithos and to make the lobby display attractive to others than dime-novel readers. This is particularly noticeable in the cheaper sections of the city. Prominent thoroughfares that were but a year ago plastered over with hideous blotches, giving a leprous aspect to a whole block, are now comparatively clean. In most of the places the wretched daubs showing the usual combination of horrors, such as striped convicts, murderous Indians, grinning "black-handers," homicidal drunkards, etc., have given way to a far cleaner method of display, consisting of frames with photos, showing not only horrors but other things as well; as, for instance, scenes from animated weeklies, comedies and dramas which do not appeal to the vulgar exclusively. The result of this change in lobby displays must have been in every way satisfactory to the owners of the theaters, for they stick to it. It is pleasing to note the quality of the patrons that stop in front of the cleaner display. In the theaters which wisely follow this policy, the gun film is particularly unwelcome.

The gravest objections against the presentation of too many close-range views of revolvers, guns, etc., remains to be stated. The effect of such pictures on the minds of the young, especially on the minds of growing boys, is thoroughly bad. Boys are naturally attracted to revolvers and firearms generally. To see the details of expert manipulation depicted on the screen adds to this morbid desire. The crop of young fools and old who are hurt or killed every year through "playing" with firearms is always large, and we certainly do not want to see the motion picture guilty of adding to it. The "Did-not-know-it-was-loaded" idiot is numerous enough as it is. The kinematograph cannot afford to aid and abet deadly curiosity of this kind. If the nuisance is suffered to continue, it will put a real weapon in the hands of our enemies.

YES, THERE ARE WOMEN DELEGATES, TOO.

Louise C. Schmitz, of Cleveland, and Miss Ida Mertsky, of Chicago, two of the three women delegates in attendance at the convention, were at the exposition in attendance all week. Mrs. Schmitz never misses a state or national convention. A mutual friend in a group gathered at the World booth said that the delegate has one of the prettiest theaters in Ohio—that it evidences in many ways the feminine hand in its management and in the selection of a program. Mrs. Schmitz is favorably known to her adult patrons for the scrupulous care she bestows on the little ones.

Miss Mertsky paid her respects to the Moving Picture World, and says she considers it the trade authority.

Theatrical Feature Plays

By Louis Reeves Harrison

THE feature play came timidly, and it is still coming along in a half-hearted way, possibly on the general principle that nothing especially good is ever done in a hurry. But dependence on past performance may only dwarf and stunt what is bound to be a powerful medium for high and bright minds to get into sympathetic communication with those groping in semi-darkness. Let us hope for the best—hope may lead to progress—but rapid advancement is not entirely consistent with repeating old errors.

The best stories of other days, those which quickened thought through emotion during past generations, are nearly all well preserved in literary form. Their accessibility and the surety that they were once good, quite as much as their low cost, caused them to be ravaged for feature-play material, but they have been so pillaged and despoiled that there is very little left in their wide domain, and they have not always been treated on the screen with the respect due their years and unquestioned excellence. Some of them could have been recognizd by the title alone.

The next step taken to provide the dear public with bright and varied entertainment on the screen was to utilize those copyright stories which were no longer in active circulation, whose authors were willing to accord rights of screen reproduction for a small consideration or for the sake of seeing their creations visualized. Such stories may occasionally be well worth a second trial, but most of them are of the kind that reach a limited circulation for a year or two and are then snuffed because of their narrow appeal. We cannot light modern thought with torches burned out.

We will next have a series of feature photodramas derived from stage presentations. In spite of the fact that the form and treatment of any subject in the photoplay follow those of the novel more closely than they do form and treatment of stage presentation, I am inclined to look for superior results. The novelist, man of many professions combined in one, enjoys an autocratic privilege of reigning undisturbed in his domain. I felt that autocratic spirit swelling within me when great producers like Blackton or Griffith made no alteration in my scenarios, but when I came to practical work with Porter, whose genius flashes out again and again in "Prisoner of Zenda," I began to realize how composite is the work of turning out a fine production for the screen.

The hand of Frohman was visible in "Prisoner of Zenda"; Hackett's personality shone out so effectively that one cannot conceive of its success without him; Porter's direction was of tremendous value; numerous and varied elements contributed to a common end. Inasmuch as the art of photoplay writing is in an imperfect stage of development these well molded and tried plays of the stage will be of undoubted value as a step to the last of the series, the splendid drama written for the screen alone, the ultimate development of the New Art.

Every successful novelist understands the necessity of delicate and unobtrusive preparation for what is to follow, so that the story may seem to grow out of a natural and logical sequence of events, so that it may appear to be what the young man in his first throes of criticism calls "true to life." The youthful critic is quite as unaware as the uncritical audience that the sense of what is impending is aroused by the author when he inconspicuously points to the solution of the problem that best serves his purposes. There is, however, small likelihood that novelists will enter the field of moving picture production, whereas producers of stage plays familiar with the necessity of careful preparation and other essentials of craftsmanship are flocking to moving pictures for productive purposes.

These newcomers may seriously mar progress in the New Art if they expect to apply stage technics in their entirety to story-telling on the screen. They are in the position of a novelist who attempts to dramatize his work without full knowledge of the requisites of stage preparation. They are as yet unaware of essential readjustments. Few indeed are the great stage plays that would have other than farcical effect on the audience if they were presented in wordless form. They would afford some such unhappy spectacle as does the Divine Sarah minus her thrilling voice.

It must be taken for granted that theatrical men are not crude enough to attempt anything like an exact reproduction of what has been favorably received on the stage, and no one doubts the bill-board value of well-known plays readjusted for screen displays, but those who frequent moving picture shows have been a long time at it and have unconsciously formulated standards of their own that are not to be disregarded. I have recently noted greater beauty of background in screen presentations than has ever been attempted in stage settings, and the expression of thought in artistic form constitutes the highest value of what is shown in moving pictures. This constitutes a New Art complete in itself.

Much good is to be expected from men who have some knowledge of what is required in dramatic routine, composition, construction, and the art of playmaking, even if they are contaminated by playhouse conventions. This is especially true of men who have been made aware through hard experience of a change of sentiment among those who attend theaters, who have made a careful and intelligent study of those they desire to address. The best of them already know that nothing is more secure to attain success than composition handled in a masterly manner, and they may be among the first to accord recognition to what is now painfully lacking, genius in the scenario.

The weak spot in motion-picture production, lack of good plays, is as weak as it has ever been because no reward is offered those who must expend a vast amount of time and energy to create what will make a deep and lasting impression. An attempt will be made to remedy this fault with reconstructed stage plays for a while, but the sum total of human knowledge is advancing too rapidly for dependence upon what has been creditably done in the past and can only be surpassed by the highest and brightest forms of imaginative work by authors of the hour.

It may be optimistic to look for any such improvement in the light of present events, but the world keeps on progressing in its own inscrutable way, and if evolution teaches anything it indicates in a rather indefinite way that our tendency is towards a better state of affairs than we noy enjoy. In our progress toward higher freedom and better self-realization the great feature drama of the screen seems destined to play a significant part, to which the recent change may contribute its full share.

Ashes

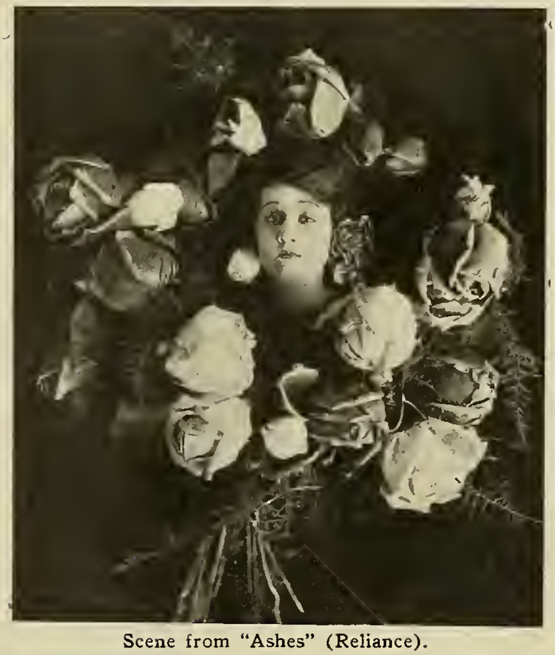
An Artistic Reliance Two-Reel Feature.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

NOT only artistic, but delightful, is this screen romance. It is one of the kind that appeals to all classes, and it will give the best of them as much pleasure as the humblest. It has all the charm of reminiscent love, mystery and adventure, such as many a man who has lived the life of a free lance can recall, and its presentation exhibits a wondrous amount of care and good taste. Director Apfell is to be congratulated upon his admirable selection of types, the beauty and appropriateness of his settings and upon his poetic interpretation of the romantic play.

Irving Cummings, always a consistent artist and fast becoming a great one, plays the role of an old thoroughbred who knows that his end is near, and who has his venerable servant set a banquet table for the shadows of past loves. At each plate is a bouquet, one each of violets, lilies of the valley, orchids, roses and sweet pea blossoms. Only five! Some men I have met—I am naming no names—could exhaust the whole floral nomenclature and not have enough to go round. Five is enough to crowd two reels with ardent love and lively adventure yet not tire an audience of one gentleman's escapades.

The fine old boy dismisses his servant and takes up the bouquet of violets. It is now shown in such small scope that the screen is filled with the modest blossoms. From their midst emerges the face of the girl they symbolize, the flowers framing her face and remaining to frame the picture of action that follows as her features gradually dissolve. All during the story of this girl, a romance of the early sixties, the movement of characters is entirely enclosed by the violets, and they reappear at its close.



Scene from "Ashes" (Reliance).

This delicate representation of thought through the medium of double exposure gives moving pictures a decided advantage over stage plays, particularly now that asides have been discorded. We may glimpse moods profound, pathetic or pleasant without the intervention of facial expression. We can closely follow the secret thoughts traversing the mind of a leading character, or the one in whom we are most deeply interested, and thus be drawn more closely into sympathy with the central personality in a drama. When the violets fade from the screen, we are again given a view of the host of the banquet of shadows as he takes up the bouquet of orchids, and the process is repeated.

In each case a new girl appears, and each one will make ambitious young men in front sit up and take notice. With Bobbie Roberts, Nome Phillips, Eugenie d'Lespine, Rosemary Theby and Irene Hawley materializing in the bouquets of characterizing flowers, there is almost a Winter Garden array of beauty, but I am wise enough to cast no apple of discord in their midst. With each there is an adventure, a complete story in itself. At the end the old beau stands alone for a moment, then he pours out a glass of good cheer and salutes the first one. In spiritual form she appears and takes her appointed place. Another and another is toasted until the banquet chairs are all filled with the shades of past loves.

The ending is a fit conclusion, and it comes clear and sharp as a climax should.

ALLEN BUILDING NEW PICTURE HOUSES.

Two more expensive picture houses are being built by J. Allen, of the Canadian Film Exchange, Calgary, Ontario, Canada. One of them is a $75,000 theater, to seat 1,200, Moosejaw, Man., and the other is the $100,000 Allen theater at Calgary, to have a seating capacity of 1,000. Mr. Allen owns about eight other costly moving picture houses in Canada. He and Mr. P. Kauffman, general manager of the Toronto branch of the Canadian Film Exchange, were visitors in New York during the exposition and convention week.

CINEMATOGRAPH FILM CENSORSHIP IN ITALY.

(Consul General James A. Smith, Genoa.)

The Italian Government has planned a stricter supervision of motion pictures in Italy and levying a tax on cinematographic productions. A bill has recently been introduced in the Italian Chamber of Deputies by the Minister of Finance providing for a tax of 10 centesimi ($0.0193) per linear meter (3.28 feet) of film (imported as well as that of domestic production). The bill also provides for a censorship of motion pictures which are to be produced in Italy, prohibiting films portraying pictures distasteful or contrary to public decency and morality, especially those reproducing scenes of cruelty, etc., or which might be an incentive to crime.

PHILIP LONERGAN TO CALIFORNIA.

One of the new things about New Majestic is a change in the scenario system. Formerly scenarios were bought in the business offices at New Rochelle and also in the producing offices at Los Angeles. This week a chief scenario editor for the whole business takes office. He is Philip Lonergan, former assistant to Lloyd Lonergan of Thanhouser Company, and will have headquarters right on the field of producing operations at the Brooklyn Heights studio, Los Angeles. Producing Manager Hite figured that it would be wiser to place the work of writing and purchasing scenarios under one head, headquartered right where the directors are working. A miniature theater is the latest addition to the New Majestic works at Brooklyn Heights. An acting addition is Howard Davies, who created the "Fatty" moving pictures.

"A Good Little Devil" Shown

By Hanford C. Judson.

ON the evening of July 10, the Famous Players' Company did its part in entertaining the delegates to the Third National Convention of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League, giving a reception in its studio, 213 West 26th street, New York City. Considerably over two thousand people called during the evening, and among them one noticed many men and women of importance on the legitimate stage as well as in motion picturedom. The main floor of the studio is unusually large; but there was not room enough to accommodate all comfortably.

The lighting of the room was subdued and pleasant. Over a part of the floor, railed off for dancing, electric lamps under the ceiling were curtained by filmy blue cloth bordered with gold fringe with the effect as of a fairy tent under which, after the four reels of Belasco's production, dealing with fairies and happy children, the guests followed the invitation of music to the exercise that seems to give wings to human feet. Another part of the floor was set with tables on which refreshments were served and along one side there was arranged a theater. The stage of this was a beautiful scene from "The Good Little Devil," showing the garden of the blind girl's home with its gates opening toward a mysterious country with a castle perched high on a mountain top and full of suggestions of "Magic casements opening on the foam of perilous seas in fairy lands forlorn." At one side of the little house stood the old tree with a hollow heart from which the fairies came when called forth to meet us.

Mr. Daniel Frohman formally welcomed the guests, after which Ernest Truex, the "Good Little Devil," delivered the play's prologue, and then a scene was enacted just as before the camera. The little blind girl, Mary Pickford, came from the house with her collie dog and opened the gates for her playmate. To see this scene as played and then to see it shortly afterward as pictured, was a great treat to most of the spectators, for it gave them a chance to get an insight into motion picture making that few are fortunate enough to have. It was educational, too, as pointing out the difference between a scene on a stage and a picture on the screen.

When this had been enacted—and, by the way, Mary Pickford won in it tremendous applause from the audience—a screen was swung out from the side and the complete picture thrown upon it. The conditions, both in the way of comfort of the spectators and in the projection, were not ideal, though fair. The room was warm and overcrowded and many had to crane their necks to see it all. Some who applauded very enthusiastically stood up through the whole of its four reels. That the audience watched it so closely and was so markedly pleased with it is a good indication that it will go very strongly in the regular picture houses. One heard such comments as, "What a lovely picture!" and "Isn't it delightful?" and such expressions were heard from all over the house.

It is, indeed, a most artistic production, full of beautiful scenes and backgrounds, and full, too, of pleasant sentiments and of human situations and characters. There is hardly an artistic flaw in it through all its four thousand feet and, from first to last, a master's hand in its making is plain. If there have been stories more surely adaptable to the peculiar illustration that motion pictures can give, the shortcoming, in considering it as an offering to the public, is more than made up by the play's popularity. That it is one of Mr. Belasco's big successes is, alone, enough to make people want to see it. We think it as good, almost, as any fairy picture could be and, in the past, fairy pictures have been very popular, especially with children and their mothers.

The opening scene presents David Belasco in his study, before an open fire, visualizing a scene of the play. While he sits the fairies come in around him and with them the little blind girl. This is remarkably effective. In it the fairies surely "get over"—in a poet's dream. It seems, in its strength, to contrast a little with some of the fairy scenes in the play itself, but the contrast will be more noticeable to grown folks than to children, or to such as can easily give themselves to the spirit of such a piece. The picture will invite such and carry them into the realms of dreams; but it will compel none, unless they are eager to be led; yet it is full of things that will please the many.

The story is well known. Its hero is a little aristocrat, left an orphan. His grandfather, the old lord, sends him to a queer, ogre-like aunt who treats him brutally; but he finds a friend, a neighbor's child, a little blind girl whom he helps and who becomes his playmate. The children believe in fairies and live in a fairy realm and are helped by the light-winged, dream-folk in their difficulties with the old aunt and, at length, after the Good Little Devil has been educated above the blind girl and has come back a bad little devil, it is they who give the girl her sight and also recall the Good Little Devil into the boy's breast and make him her sweetheart once more.

The aunt, the ogre, played by Will Norris, stands sharply out in the picture as furnishing the darker contrast against which the child-like sweetness of the love story, set forth by Mary Pickford and Ernest Truex, is brought out, and both of these elements are clearly and effectively drawn, so that, in the very heart of the picture, there is a quality with a strong appeal that is sure to make the offering widely popular. The old woman is played to give most truthfully and half humorously the fairy tale atmosphere—the ugly facial expression, the almost bloodthirsty cruelty, the fear-inspiring walk, all these things are just what they should be. Then, Mary Pickford has a role suited to her genius for delicate sympathies and as delicate pathos. She is wholly lovely and is well supported by Ernest Truex, who is a sort of Peter Pan at heart. We mustn't forget the blind girl's dog, a frollicking, friendly dog, full of antics, though it must have been warm playing the role in all that fur. And the picture is also beautifully photographed with some exquisitely lovely scenes. It is an offering that will excite enthusiasm and fulfill the promises of the exhibitor, who may pave the way for it with extensive and strong advertising.

A PERNICIOUS CINCINNATI ORDINANCE.

Lem S. Miller, of Cincinnati, stated recently to a World representative that there is an ordinance in the city of Cincinnati which establishes a board of three to examine applicants for a license to operate motion picture machines. The ordinance does not of itself define the qualifications of the applicant, nor establish a standard of efficiency, but leaves it solely to the discretion of the examiners to determine whether or not the applicant is qualified for the position. It leaves the examiner the sole and arbitrary judge of the ability of the operator.

This ordinance is of such a character as to be in contravention of the State and Federal Constitutions, as it appears to be an attempt to delegate to the examiners legislative powers that should have been exercised by the legislature of the State or the council of the city.

Recently, an exhibitor, who is an efficient operator and understands the operation and construction of machines, was arrested for operating his machine without a license, although he owned a theater and had considerable experience in running a machine. A writ of habeas corpus was issued in the Court of Appeals, which directly affects the constitutionality of the ordinance, and the decision in the case will be a very valuable precedent in other cases of like character throughout the United States.

The Supreme Courts of Ohio and other States have decided with reference to other ordinances of this character that they were unconstitutional. It is suggested to the exhibitors who have grievances of this kind that they watch the outcome of this particular case. The case is being handled for the exhibitors by Lem S. Miller, general counsel of Local No. 2, State of Ohio, who is also counsel for the Builders' and Traders' Exchange of Cincinnati, which is a very influential organization. He is also attorney for the State organization, and he feels assured that the outcome of the case will be successful to the exhibitor.

These examiners were appointed by the Mayor, and in ordinances of this character it opens up the situation to a great deal of abuse, if they are so disposed.

HAS YACHT AND STEWARD.

President Hite of the Thanhouser Film Corporation now has a real yacht and is a member of the exclusive New Rochelle Yacht Club up in the section where the Thanhouser pictures are made. The name of the boat is "The Dividend." Lloyd Lonergan is chief mate and Bert Adler steward. It is understood that every time Bert Adler buys a loaf of bread for the boat he asks the baker for a commission, just like a regular steward. Indeed, it is hinted at that this is exactly why he wanted the job.

William Russell has joined the Thanhouser Auto Brigade. It is a Pope-Toledo and said to be quite trimmer than any other machine in the Thanhouser fleet. One reason ascribed for the large purchase of automobiles by Thanhouserites is that there is nothing else to do in New Rochelle.

"The Banshee"

An Intensely-Human, Two-Reel Kay-Bee.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

MUCH better done than ever before is this Irish story. It is intense at times, has abundant action, and the magnificent work of Barney Sherry in the leading role holds attention throughout. He is not of a physical type to be ordinarily selected for the part, but this is forgotten and forgiven soon after the story is under way. His virile personality commands interest and keeps it at the highest pitch during scenes quite as thrilling as they are logical and natural.

Scene from "The Banshee" (Kay-Bee).

In plain truth, the story itself, dwelling as it does upon a common human failing without attempt to cover or excuse it, helps materially to bring the screen representation close to the heart of the audience. When Barney set out to fill the role he did so with such consummate skill that he must have been in tacit sympathy with the character he portrays. It is that of a young husband and father of good heart led astray by a bad habit.

Scene from "The Banshee" (Kay-Bee).

Barney of the screen is a lusty Irishman with a sweet home, sweeter wife and sweetest baby. The habit of taking a drop too much was, however, becoming so set that only a shock of some kind could be expected to restore his manliness and self-control. The shock comes in a dream so well suggested that it is far more logical than most attempts at realism in photoplays. A thought is stirred in his mind when a handsome young landlord calls for the rent and is put off by the tact of Barney's attractive wife.

This idea recurs in a drunken dream, so vivid and thrilling that one forgets the vision while absorbed in what might easily have been the natural course of events to a tragic conclusion. All the ferocity and cunning that seem to be quickened by the influence of liquor on the human animal are called into intense action. He is what man becomes in his alcoholic reversion to earlier type, the most dangerous brute in all creation, the most merciless as well. There is great depth to this masterly characterization.

A swift succession of dramatic incidents leads to double murder, a vengeful attempt to burn the cottage where the murderer is concealed, his escape, and his return to rescue the helpless child he has forgotten. Coincident with his manly impulse to save rather than destroy, comes an awakening, with recollection so vivid that the wauling of a cat on the window sill is mistaken for the prophetic cry of a banshee. in terror and contrition, in belief that all the horrors of his experience are but the baseless fabric of a dream, Barney of the screen is restored to what nature intended him to be—every inch a man.

THE EVER-IN-DANGER ACTRESS.

Flo La Badie, one of the prettiest of the Thanhouser leading women, has lost her limp. Probably you never knew she had one, but had you been present at the Thanhouser reception at the Moving Picture Exposition, New York, you'd have known about it. The reception was given by the Thanhouser players in the Mutual booth and canes and fans were distributed. Miss La Badie's stand was in the left hand corner of the booth. The mob outside of the booth, in its efforts to get souvenirs, tore down the rail before the booth and finally the fire authorities told Bert Adler to stop the souvenir distribution while the private officers cleared the aisle. When the rail before the portion of the booth where Miss La Badie stood gave way, it fell on her knee, causing some bruises. Miss La Badie now says that the Photoplay actress isn't only in danger in leap-for-life moving picture scenes.

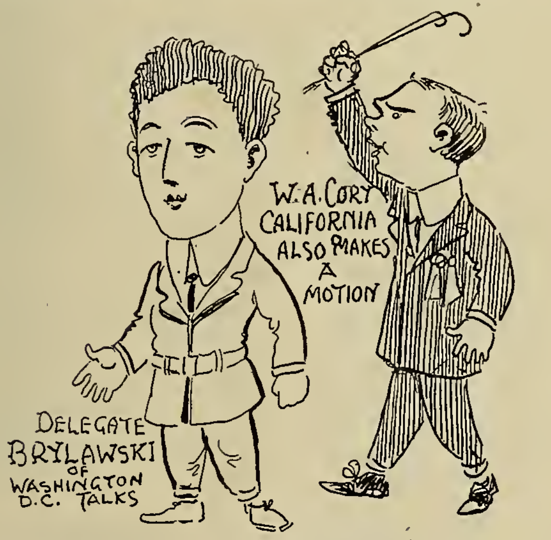
Delegates Re-elect President Neff, Representatives of Several States Bolt the Convention to Form New Organization—National League Closes Quietly—Banquet at Brighton Beach—Other Features

By James S. McQuade.

WHEN the convention had been called to order Friday morning, a member questioned the chair as to the order of business, whether the election of national officers should at once proceed or the Committe on Rules and Resolutions be called upon to make their report. The chair ruled that the election of officers should at once be held, according to the motion carried at Wednesday's session. This ruling was objected to on the ground that the motion made no specification that the election of officers should first be proceeded with, Robert R. Levy, vice-president of the Chicago Local, and other speakers supporting the contention. Mr. Levy held that the report should first be read, as it was necessary for candidates to know the nature of the platform on which they would be asked to stand.

The chair still adhered to the former ruling and an appeal was immediately taken, President Neff calling L. H. Blumenthal, of New Jersey, to preside while the vote was taken. Mr. Blumenthal's decision, that a two-thirds vote would be required to decide the point at issue, raised another storm of protests, and an appeal was made from his decision. Judge Tugwell, of California, was conducted to the platform, with the evident purpose of having him replace Mr. Blumenthal, but it was ruled that the action was unconstitutional, as no appeal could be made from the ruling of the temporary chairman, before a motion was made and carried to appeal from his decision. On referring to a handbook on parliamentary law, Mr. Blumenthal announced that a majority vote, not a two-thirds, was required, and with this understanding the vote was taken. A vote of 93 to 64 sustained the ruling of President Neff, who again took the chair. John Miller, of Chicago, and G. L. Wunders, of Baltimore, were appointed tellers and the election of the national president began.



Election of Officers.

Ohio cast her 15 votes for Neff. Before the Illinois vote was taken, Mr. Levy, of Chicago, arose and withdrew the name of Wm. J. Sweeney, substituting that of J. S. Phillips, of Fort Worth, Tex., who was given the 11 votes of Illinois. Pennsylvania gave Neff 6 and Phillips 3, the latter being voted by the Pittsburgh delegates. Indiana bestowed her seven votes on Phillips, but Michigan balanced them by her 7 votes. West Virginia and Kentucky each gave Neff 7, and Wisconsin cast her 6 votes for Phillips. New Jersey gave Neff 6 and Phillips 1. Missouri followed with 6 votes for Neff and Iowa with 3 votes. Minnesota presented Phillips with her 8 votes, after Alabama and Louisiana had each given Neff 1.

Now the turn of the Lone Star State came, and eyes and ears were wide open for the announcement of that vote. When Mr. Phillips arose and declared that Texas cast her solid vote of 8 for Neff, a veritable pandemonium reigned for many minutes. It was impossible to restore order. Neff's supporters rolled up a volume of ecstatic cheers that drowned the fiery and impassioned anathemas of the men who had supported Phillips. During the slight lull, Sam Trigger, president of New York City Local, already hoarse and wilted by his efforts to be heard, succeeded in telling the convention that the "double cross" had been given the supporters of Phillips. M. A. Choynski, of Chicago, tore up the standard of Illinois and marched towards the door, followed by the Illinois delegation. Fourteen delegates from New York, all those of Wisconsin, Minnesota and Indiana, three delegates from Pennsylvania, and the two delegates from California marched after the Illinois men. A rump convention was to be held by the seceders.

At the time of the bolt, Neff had piled up 82 votes against the 53 votes of his opponent, and after the seceders left the room, Massachusetts, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Kansas, Maine, Connecticut, Florida, Maryland, Virginia and Georgia—the only remaining states with votes—added to the Neff landslide. Mr. Phillips, of Texas, then moved that the vote be declared unanimous, which was done.

G. H. Wiley, national vice-president of Missouri, was elected national secretary unanimously, receiving 104 votes. J. J. Rieder, national treasurer, was also elected unanimously, to succeed himself, J. Howard Bennett, of Baltimore, having withdrawn in his favor.

President Neff then appointed members to fill the vacancies made by the bolting delegates in the Committees on Rules and Regulations and Constitution and By-laws, which now have the following members:

Rules and Resolutions Committee: J. S. Phillips, of Texas; R. L. Macnab, New York City; Peter J. Jeup, Detroit; L. S. Miller, Cincinnati, and Marion Pierce, Maryland.

Constitution and By-laws Committee: Louise Schmitz, Cleveland; M. Shelton, Missouri; Fred Ruhlman, New Jersey; C. E. Tandy, Virginia, and T. P. Finnigan, Texas.

It was then 12:45 p.m. and the convention adjourned until 3 o'clock.

Friday Afternoon Session.

G. H. Wiley, the new national secretary, as soon as the convention got down to business, read the following announcement, which was unanimously adopted by the convention and spread on the minutes:

J.A. MADDOX OF COLUMBUS

LEM S. MILLER
ONE OF OHIO'S LEADING DELEGATES

To the Exhibitors of the United States and Canada, by the Convention of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Now in Session: "We wish to announce to every member of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America in the United States and Canada that the action taken by the delegates of Illinois, New York, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Indiana in leaving the Convention Hall has left these states without representation, only in the case of New York. where two delegates remained—Mr. McNab and Mr. Samuels.

"Pennsylvania cannot be considered as leaving, as six delegates out of nine remained. Mr. Herrington, Mr. Polk and

Mr. Victor, of Pittsburgh, who were delegates from the state of Pennsylvania, left the convention. Owing to the fact that the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America is working under a charter issued by the state of Ohio, and by reason of the action taken by the delegates from the states above mentioned, for the benefit of the members of these states, we ask the members to notify the national officers, whether or not they endorse the action of their delegates in bolting the convention.

"All states that endorse the action of their delegates in leaving the convention will immediately forward their charter and all supplies to the secretary of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Geo. H. Wiley, Kansas City, Mo., and all members who wish to retain their membership and affiliate with the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America will communicate with M. A. Neff, the national president, 1003 Mercantile Library Building, Cincinnati, O.; also with National Secretary Geo. H. Wiley, of Kansas City, Mo., and their membership will stand until a new organization is organized in their respective states—which will be immediately—and new officers elected.

"This does not in any way affect any member of this League who is in good standing and desires to continue; it does not affect the state organization in any way, shape or form, providing the state does not endorse the action of its delegates in convention assembled; but all delegates, who left this convention and bolted, are hereby suspended from this organization.

"M. A. NEFF, President.
"GEO. H. WILEY, Secretary."

The report of the Rules and Resolutions Committee was then read and adopted unanimously. A clause which stated that censorship was not an opportune question at this time was included among the recommendations offered.

The report of the Committee on Constitution and By-laws recommended that a first and second vice-president be elected during the convention and that a publicity officer be appointed by the president at each recurring national convention.

At this juncture Sam Trigger was admitted to the Convention Hall to furnish tickets for the banquet at Manhattan Beach, Saturday evening.

New Rule for Election of National Officers.

An important amendment to the constitution was then discussed. The amendment is intended as a rule of procedure for all future national conventions, in the nomination and election of national officers. It provides for their nomination and election, in order, on the morning of the second day of the convention, at 10:30 o'clock. The nominations for a president, national secretary and national treasurer will be immediately followed, in each case, by the election of those officers. The amendment was adopted unanimously, its purpose being intended to prevent undue wire pulling and shady politics, and to promote harmony among the delegates assembled. The constitution and the amendments, as a whole, were then adopted.

Increase of President's Salary.

A motion was made by Mr. Washburn, of Massachusetts, that the salary of the national president be raised from $1,200 to $2,000 per year. It was passed unanimously.

A vote of thanks was then moved and carried in recognition of the loyalty to the League of the delegates from New Jersey, of Mr. Macnab and Mr. Samuels, of New York (the only two remaining after the bolt of that state). The press was also included in this motion, its courteous treatment and fairness being specially referred to. Mr. Blumenthal, of New Jersey, was particularly thanked for his unswerving support and loyalty.

The next motion carried provided that every member of the League should donate one dollar on September 12 next, for working funds. The Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America will be three years old on that date. The donations should be sent to Geo. H. Wiley, national secretary, Kansas City, Mo., and they will be turned over by him to J. J. Rieder, national treasurer.

The last business done by the convention, at the Friday afternoon session, was the selection of a city for the national convention of 1914. Clem Kerr, of Dayton, O., named his home city, and Mr. Jeup, of Detroit, recommended that city. Mr. Kerr read a letter from Mr. Patterson, president of the National Cash Register Company, Dayton, in which $2,500 was tendered the League if they selected Dayton as a meeting place. Another letter from the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, Dayton, placed the Memorial Hall, which seats 6,000 people, at the disposal of the delegates. A vote was taken and Dayton was chosen unanimously, Mr. Jeup having withdrawn the name of Detroit. Adjournment was then made until Saturday, July 12, at 10:00 a. m.

CLOSING SESSION, SATURDAY MORNING, JUNE 12.

After calling the meeting to order, President Neff made a few remarks before proceeding to business. Attention was drawn to a few mistakes in some of the morning newspapers, among them the statement that Canada had seceded with the delegates that walked out Friday morning. Mr. Neff stated that Canada was not represented and could not, therefore, have withdrawn from the league. He also emphasized the fact that it still remained to be shown that the States represented by seceding delegates would endorse the action of the latter, and that all these States will be reorganized, if necessary, in the interests of the M. P. E. L. of America.

The nomination and election of a first and a second vice-president was then begun. Mr. Washburn, of Massachusetts, nominated Mr. Macnab, of New York, and Abe Seligman, of Louisiana, seconded the nomination. Mr. Macnab was declared elected by acclamation. For second vice-president, Clem Kerr, of Dayton, O., named T. P. Finnigan, of Texas, and Mr. Brumler, of Michigan, made the seconding speech. Mr. Finnigan was also declared elected by acclamation.

The following resolutions were read by Mr. Vestal, of Ohio:

"Resolved, That this convention recommend that not to exceed three reels for five cents be considered a program, and not to exceed four reels of 1,000 feet each at any price, and that the convention instruct the National Executive Committee to use every means in its power to reduce the program to two reels for five cents and not to exceed four reels at any price.

"Resolved, That we view with alarm the present conditions whereby police authorities and others have exercised the authority to stop our entertainments and take away from us the right to exhibit pictures, causing us not only personal embarrassment, but also financial embarrassment.

"Resolved, That the National Executive Committee be authorized to communicate with the manufacturers, film exchanges and others engaged in our line of business for the purpose of coming to a definite understanding whereby all moving pictures may come under the supervision of the Board of Censors, or that other arrangements be made to protect the interests of the moving picture exhibitor, manufacturers, film exchanges and others, to the end that when moving pictures are delivered to the exhibitor that no authority will have the power to stop the exhibition of such pictures."

It should be noted that the third resolution does not specify any special form of censorship.

The first and second resolutions were carried, and the third was amended to read as follows, before being passed:

"Resolved, That the entire matter of censorship be referred to the Executive Committee, with full power to take up the question of some form of reasonable supervision of the exhibition, or restraint, of objectionable moving pictures; said committee to confer with the various State Leagues and with the manufacturers and exchanges, so that the highest interests of exhibitors may be conserved and the public thereby won to moving picture interests."

A resolution to the effect that manufacturers of films be requested to do away with cigarette smoking in the production of pictures was next passed.

About this time W. A. Cory, of California, took the floor and announced that California had not joined the seceders. He stated that, though he had walked out, he had not entered the hall where they were conducting a rump convention, nor had he participated in any of the proceedings. In fact, so far as he was concerned, California had been represented by him in the election of the national treasurer, J. J. Rieder, after the bolt had been made.

Since Mr. Cory made this statement, President Neff received a message from the president of the California league that the majority of members were with him and the M. P. E. L. of A.

Other resolutions passed were against the offering of premiums, against six-reel features, and the furnishing of service to theaters which run pictures for only a few months in the year. Airdomes as well as large dramatic houses were included in the ban.

Clem Kerr, of Dayton, introduced a resolution that the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America should travel strictly in the middle of the road with regard to licensed and independent pictures. It was carried. Another resolution was passed signifying that it was the sense of the organization that photoplay manufacturers, and manufacturers of improvements and appliances, pertaining to the betterment of moving pictures, should make the first offer of their wares to legitimate moving picture exhibitors now in the field.

Mr. Washburn then moved a vote of thanks to the press for fair reports of the convention and for the courtesy shown, after which President Neff closed the third national convention with the request that members of the league remain faithful and honest to every trust, and with the hope that the next annual convention will be a meeting of brother with brother.

THE BANQUET

Over a Thousand Delegates and Other Guests Enjoy New Yorkers' Hospitality—Many Interesting Speeches.

The banquet tendered by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Greater New York to the visiting delegates was successful from all angles. It was held in the Brighton Beach Casino on Friday evening. Dinner was served with unusual promptness, shortly after the appointed hour, eight o'clock. Summer heat was tempered by a cool breeze right off the ocean. About a thousand sat down. At the speakers' table there were, besides those hereafter mentioned, J. A. Berst, of the Pathe Company; John Rock, Frank Howard, Elias B. Goodman, Edward P. V. Ritter, William Pelzer, W. B. F. Rogers and Baron Lucke d'Aix of Germany.

There were many players there, too, and as they entered the dining hall were given a cordial reception by their fellows and by the exhibitors. The Vitagraph players were especially in evidence, among those noticed being Frederick Thomson, the director; James Young and his wife, Clara Kimball Young, and Courtenay Foote. From the Eclair came, among others, Alex Francis and "Bob" Frazer. Paul Panzer, the well-known Pathe star, was present, with Mrs. Panzer. Mr. Panzer, who motored down to the beach, was late in arriving through a blowout which for a time delayed his party.

The feature of the evening, of course, was the speaking. There was much of it. There was little attempt to strike a serious note, nearly all of the speakers recognizing the fact that the gathering was there for a good time and leaving more sombre discussions for the floor of the convention. There were one or two veiled references to the stormy scenes of the day. One of these was by J. Stuart Blackton, the vice-president of the Vitagraph Company, who aroused a storm of laughter when in opening his remarks he lamented his inability to say "Mr. President," because, he said, a man had just taken him over in the corner and informed him that "there ain't no s ch animal."

John Bunny was toastmaster. He said that all who had to do with the exposition had cause for congratulation in its great success. Frank L. Dyer, the president of the General Film Company, brought out long-continued applause when he advocated an improvement in quality and a reduction in the number of reels shown. Sam Spedon, of the Vitagraph Company, spoke interestingly and briefly. Mr. Blackton made one of the best speeches of the night, and was closely followed. He spoke in a light vein and kept the company in continuous laughter. So, also, did Frank I. Cohen, master of works and councillor for Glasgow, Scotland, who, in smooth periods, ornamented by the native wit and the accent brought to more recent fame by Harry Lauder, told his experiences in the American metropolis and of his great regard for this country. James G. Wallace, chief of the Bureau of Licenses, kept the party in a gale of mirth as he described alleged happenings in the household of one of those present and turned on Mr. Cohen an incident which many of those present very well knew had been laid to the door of another Scotchman. R. G. Hollaman held the interest of his auditors as he described the beginning of the moving picture as an amusement attraction—seventeen years ago at the Eden Musee.

BILL "KALEM" WRIGHT

V.R. DAY.

William Wright, of the Kalem Company spoke of the possibilities of the moving picture. The Rev. Walter E. Howe, of Jersey City, spoke for the clergy. It was a speech animated, vigorous; he declared the interest of the church in motion pictures. Judge Tugwell, of California, addressed the diners as a native of New York City who had gone West fourteen years ago and returned now to his old home as a delegate of the exhibitors of Los Angeles. Hugh Hoffman spoke of the conditions under which the exhibitors worked a half dozen years ago, indicating by illustrations of the handicaps of those days the advance in the method of marketing films and the improvement in the manufacture of pictures. Ed. Mock, of Motography, humorously referred to the dinner on Wednesday evening given to the publicity men at which he said an effort had been made to "get his goat," and waived his allotted three minutes in favor of another speaker. Other speakers were Joe Brandt, William T. Rock, Len Spencer and Reuben Simons, of the Street Cleaning Department, who is known as "the blind orator."

Mr. Dyer Opens the Speaking.

"I want to speak of two matters that lie very close to my heart," said Mr. Dyer. "I don't know whether I voice the sentiment of the exhibitors or not; I may be making a serious mistake, but I want to urge upon you at all times to do all you can toward bringing about a condition in this business that will result in an improvement in quality of films and a reduction in the number of reels shown."

Sam Spedon pointed out that the value of the publicity man to his employers was gauged by his ability to serve others. "The slogan of the Vitagraph has been to help the exhibitor," said Mr. Spedon. Mr. Blackton told the story of the first Vitagraph comedy film ever made. There were only fifty feet in it. The company at the time occupied a small office on the thirteenth floor of a Nassau street building. The comedy was "The Burglar on the Roof," because, said the speaker, "we had no property, no scenery, but we did have a nice roof. There were four characters, the office boy, the janitress, myself as the burglar, and the roof. As a part of the business the office boy was to throw on me a bucket of water. In mistake he doused the janitress. The accident was never forgiven. Later when the picture was shown in one of Proctor's theaters, J. Austin Fynes took the trouble to tell me that some day, with practice, I might make a burglar, but I would never make an actor. The moving picture is a liberal education," continued Mr. Blackton. "It is a great universal language that is understood the whole world over, by every nation, civilized and otherwise."

Mr. Cohen aroused the enthusiasm of the diners almost at his opening by the mention of the name of Mayor Gaynor. He complimented the gathering on its great number of "bonnie lasses" and "braw laddies." He also said he so liked this country that he was inclined to remain here, "and if I do," he added, "I know I will find jolly good fellows." Mr. Wallace pledged his co-operation in all things that make for the betterment of the moving picture theaters.

"You have all been told tonight and many times before," said Mr. Wright, "of the wonderful and truly great business we are all interested in. How great and wonderful that business is we are learning as we go on. Every day we find new worlds to conquer, and we are trying to conquer them."

The Rev. Mr. Howe in opening spoke of his interest in motion pictures, saying that "several times I have turned the crank myself." Speaking to the exhibitors he said: "Very few people realize what you have really got. It seems to me that outside of some of the strongest religious forces there is absolutely nothing in this country or any other today that is having on the public the influence that you have. A few years ago the motion picture was regarded as something to amuse the people. Today you have got far beyond the comedy. Someone has said: 'Let me write the songs of a nation and I care not who makes the laws.' Let me produce the motion picture films and I care not who produces the laws."

Bert Adler was called on, but in his behalf Wendell Milligan stated that Mr. Adler was suffering from a bad cold and could not talk. Sam Trigger begged to be excused from talking, as his voice was worn to a thin edge and he was anxious to save what was left for the strenuous morrow. He extended his regards and best wishes to the gathering.

It was 11:30 when the dinner broke up. Many adjourned to the Hotel Shelburne, across the boulevard, where dancing was enjoyed until a late hour. It was, taken by and large, a real time. G. B.

VITAGRAPH COMPANY ENTERTAINS

For Six Hours the Delegates Roam Through the Studio and Plant of the Brooklyn Manufacturer.

The Vitagraph Company entertained the delegates to the convention on Friday. For six hours, following midday, over two thousand visitors strolled through the yard and about the studios and factory, escorted by members of the stock company, all of whom on duty in the East were on hand. Work at the big plant was practically suspended for the afternoon. One scene was taken, but that included the visitors as participants. Director Frederick Thomson posed a thousand or more of the large party as a circus audience and a panoramic picture was taken. The film in which the scene will appear will be entitled "Lights and Shadows." It is said that when the play is released it will carry an announcement to the effect that the circus spectators comprise the convention guests. Following the making of the picture the delegates were addressed by Mr. Rock and Mr. Blackton. The speakers stood on the camera platform, about thirty feet above the heads of the auditors.

The delegates sat down to a bounteous repast. There were chicken salad, sandwiches of all kinds, ice cream, lemonade, claret punch and iced tea. As an indication of the size of the party it may be stated that provision had been made for ice cream to supply two thousand persons and it was all consumed. The company, however, immediately obtained an added supply. Canes were given out as souvenirs. On each was attached a good-sized Vitagraph flag. Also given out was a little pamphlet containing the photographs of the Vitagraph triumvirate, Messrs. Rock, Blackton and Smith, and all of the life portrayers. It was a most enjoyable occasion.

SELIG-KLEINE-ESSANAY DAY.

Saturday was the day assigned to the Chicago licensed forces for the entertainment of visitors. The companies chose to hold a reception and give an entertainment right in the exposition hall rather than to add to the list of excursions appearing on the official list of the week's festivities. It had been announced that the companies would begin at 8 o'clock in the evening the distribution of souvenirs and refreshments, while at the same time the Royal Hawaiian Orchestra would contribute vocal and instrumental music. The souvenirs consisted of pennant puzzles and key rings from Selig; a number of Alkali Ike dolls and vanity boxes from Essanay and Quo Vadis fans from Kleine. Also a large amount of punch had been provided. At the appointed hour the show began. The crowd was on hand—in such force that it was found impossible to control the anxious ones; and they seemed to be all anxious. The result was a young riot. It was decided to transfer the cause of the commotion to the third floor, where, under the supervision of Stanley Twist, Omer F. Doud, Vernon R. Day and Don Meaney, the crowds were served. For two hours the lines were long and deep. As the souvenir hunters waited they were entertained.

The Chicago bunch had been "on the job" the entire week. As one of the representatives from the lake metropolis remarked, "I don't think any of the manufacturers made a bigger splash than we did." One of the achievements of this division was the issue on five days of the week of The Convention News, a twenty-page publication in red covers. The typography was excellent. There were items of interest about the show and also many stories about the players and the plays that make the names of Selig, Kleine and Essanay known in the film world. The Chicago crew are sure worth meeting up with. We were glad to meet them; and we'll be glad to meet them again.

EDISON NIGHT AT THE EXPOSITION.

Thomas A. Edison was the star attraction at the General Film booth on Friday evening, July 11. With Mr. Edison in the booth were Horace G. Plimpton, studio manager, and his assistant, John Hardin, and a number of the more prominent players, including Mary Fuller and Gertrude McCoy. Mr. Edison was the center of attraction and the crowd in front of the booth struggling to get a glimpse of him approached a riot all evening. Despite his age, Mr. Edison was in the best of spirits and evinced deep interest in the exposition. He was an attentive listener to all that was said in his hearing and received all comers most affably.

NO CENSORSHIP IN WISCONSIN.

The Wisconsin Assembly on July 3rd, by a unanimous vote, postponed indefinitely Senate bill 386A, amendment A, a drastic censorship bill providing all films and slides be censored by the Wisconsin Industrial Commission, at Madison. This ends State censorship for Wisconsin so far as this session is concerned. Hon. Don C. Hall, the only theatrical man in the Legislature, who assisted so nobly in killing three other like bills this session, again came to the rescue, and should be given due credit for all he has done.

MAINE BRANCH ACTIVE.

Mr. Moxley Blumenberg, president of the Maine State Branch, reports that his league is bound to be a live-wire organization, with a steadily increasing membership. To this end, Mr. Blumenberg has sent to each exhibitor in his State, who is not yet a member, a letter requesting every non-member to immediately make application for membership. Mr. Blumenberg declares that the Maine organization is going to total 100 members, in the very near future, and everyone who knows the latter's methods is sure to believe that the century mark will soon be reached. Mr. Blumenberg is interested heart and soul in the progress of his organization, and will leave no stone unturned to "put it across." The Casco Theater, Portland, is proof of Mr. Blumenberg's ability to make good, as this house is a prosperous photoplay theater, noted for the high-standard basis upon which it is run. Every Maine exhibitor should make it his business to join this branch. Get busy, boys, and do not procrastinate!

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

Bolters Form Organization and Elect Officers—Resolutions Adopted and Committees Appointed.

When the seceding delegates left the meeting which was presided over by Mr. M. A. Neff, they withdrew to an adjoining room and there held an impromptu council. The feeling among the delegates was so intense against the parent organization that any such thing as reconciliation was out of the question. The discussion was so animated that it became necessary to appoint a temporary chairman with a view towards the formation of a new exhibitors' association.

Judge A. P. Tugwell, of Los Angeles, Cal., was elected temporary chairman of the new league. The various delegates were allowed to express their feelings and sentiments until those who felt the necessity of unburdening their souls were relieved. These discussions were relative to the alleged unfair methods of the convention over which President Neff presided. They were strong in the extreme and the members were thoroughly in earnest.

When the meeting had cooled down sufficiently for rational proceedings the seceding delegates proceeded with orderly steps towards the formation of a new association. Harold W. Rosenthal, of New York, volunteered to act as temporary secretary and his services were accepted. A committee was then appointed to draw up a constitution and by-laws. This committee consisted of H. W. Rosenthal, New York; F. C. Rembusch, Indiana; Chas. H. Phillips, Milwaukee; Thomas Furniss, Duluth, Minn.; F. J. Herrington, Pittsburg, and Julius Olcott, of Illinois. A constitution and by-laws was adopted that had been prepared on the previous evening with the intention of submitting it to the national committee on constitution and by-laws, in substitution of certain clauses of the original constitution, which were found to be unsatisfactory to some of the members.

The question of financing the new league was then discussed and many enthusiastic delegates, led by H. A. Victor, of Pittsburg, came to their feet with checks or not less than three figures. Mr. Frank A. Tichenor, of New York, chairman of the exposition committee, then arose and stated that as the contract with the exposition committee was purely a local matter, the exhibitors of New York Local, No. 1, would rescind their previous promise of 25 per cent. of the profits to the National League and that the same would be contributed to the new organization as a foundation, and that they would be assured of starting upon a solid financial basis.

A set of resolutions was adopted as the sense of the organization embodying an endorsement of the National Board of Censorship as at present conducted, and to the effect that censorship in any other form is not at all desirable. After

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADF

(This Week's Installment by G. P. Von Harleman.)

AN extremely hot summer is playing havoc with the exhibitors of Chicago. Many theaters are closed for the season, and it is estimated that the number is away over the hundred mark. Business is poor all the way around, and, of course, film exchanges and dealers are affected just as well. The exchange men complain that they are not only losing customers, but that the exhibitors are cutting down their film service and expenses to a minimum. One film exchange man told me that this summer has been the worst he remembers since 1909, when fully fifty per cent. of the picture theaters in Chicago closed down, and the film business was practically at a standstill. Many of the small exhibitors closed their houses this year before July 1st, which is the date when the licenses are paid, no doubt, to put off an item of expense which could be easier met later on.

Another cause of worry to the exhibitor is the sudden enforcement of the 1910 ventilating ordinance, about which I wrote quite extensively in my last letter. Many exhibitors intimate that they are not being treated fairly. One proprietor told me that when he built his new theater, less than two years ago, he took particular pains to follow the various regulations laid down by the building department. The system of ventilation, then installed at quite considerable expense, was at that time approved and O.K.'d by the department. "Now," he says, "they come to me again and say that I can not renew my license if I don't put in this new ventilating system." Another prominent exhibitor, who has a magnificent house on the North Side, perhaps the finest here in Chicago and one of the best equipped, according to the writer's opinion, including ventilation, complains very bitterly. He says: "I can defy any man in Chicago to show me a better ventilated and more pleasant theater in the summer time than mine. Now they are trying to force me to put in their particular system of ventilation, which, for a large house like mine, would cost me between $3,000 and $4,000. Ask my patrons what they think about my place. There has not been a complaint all during the summer. In fact, many people have complimented me upon the way that I keep the air in my theater cool and fresh. It seems very remarkable to me that in spite of what one does and all the money one spends on every improvement possible, certain authorities will always find room for criticism and inspection. This inspection business seems to be a mania with some departments. Inspectors come around here almost every week to look at a thousand and one different things, and always manage to find fault. And not only that, but after you have changed some rather unimportant trifle to suit one inspector, then another man comes around—maybe next week—and will tell you that you are all wrong, and that the first man didn't know what he was talking about. This is not only annoying, but it is also expensive, as each one of these visits will cost you $2."

A Protective Organization.

Several exchange men, a number of dealers, and many exhibitors have been considering for some time the formation of a protective local organization, the sole purpose of which would be to use its influence along political lines against continued adverse ordinances and department orders, which are beginning to cause quite a good deal of anxiety among the trade here in Chicago. This new organization will aim to work in co-operation with the present League, but it will be broader in scope, and will take in every branch of the industry, not only the motion picture exhibitor, but the manufacturer, the exchange man, the dealer, and the operator as well. We will endeavor to follow any developments along these lines, and keep our readers posted on whatever will be accomplished, in future issues of the Moving Picture World.

George Kleine Donates to the Tribune's Ice Fund.

The total gross receipts from three theaters presenting George Kleine's magnificent production, "Quo Vadis?" has been donated by George Kleine to the free ice and hospital fund of the Chicago Tribune. The first Tribune ice fund performance was given Monday, July 14th, at the National Theater, West 63rd and S. Halsted Streets; the second will be given on Monday night, July 21st, at the Victoria Theater, Sheffield and Belmont Avenues, and the third on Monday night, July 28th, at the Imperial Theater, W. Madison Street and Western Avenue. The sale of seats for the benefit entertainment which opened July 12th progressed rapidly.

In the letter making the contribution, George Kleine wrote: "Realizing the vast benefit the Tribune ice fund has been to the worthy poor of Chicago, during the recent heated term, we are desirous of lending our support to the cost." A total of $1,557.75 will be realized for this worthy cause, if all the seats are taken at the three performances.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Joseph Hopp, of the Standard Film Exchange, arrived from the convention in New York, Monday morning, July 14th. Mr. Hopp was accompanied by his family on his trip East, and enjoyed himself thoroughly in the big town. The exposition, he says, was a remarkably successful affair, and considered even better than the cinematograph exposition in London by many people who had attended both. Friend Joe, being a loyal "Windy City" man, said though that when it comes to handling a convention, and particularly the entertainment part of the program, New York exhibitors have to learn a few things from the boys in Chicago.

Harry and Max Hyman, proprietors of the Janet Theater, on North Avenue, and the Barry, on Lincoln Avenue, landed in New York, Wednesday of last week, from a two month's trip abroad. Messrs. Hyman visited a number of foreign countries, including Italy, France and Germany. Their father accompanied them on the trip. They remained in New York a few days to take in the big "doings," and arrived back in Chicago on Monday, July 14th.

Fred W. Pierce, of the Pierce Amusement Enterprise, of New Orleans, arrived here Saturday, July 12th, and stayed over Sunday, as a personal guest of Fred Aiken, manager of the General Film Company, in Chicago. Mr. Pierce came by way of Denver, where he has some concessions to look after at the White City. Mr. Pierce continued his trip east to Ocean View, Va., where he is also interested in amusement enterprises.

Wm. Rohe, manager and one of the proprietors of the Liberty Theater at Milwaukee Avenue and Division Street, has left this week on a six to seven weeks' trip to British Columbia and the Pacific states. Ed. Lansing will act as manager during Mr. Rohe's absence.

* * *

A. G. Spencer, of the General Feature Film Company, leaves this week for an extensive business trip through Wisconsin, in the interests of his firm.

J. Paley, manager of the Bijou Theater, at Halsted Street and Jackson Boulevard, has returned this week from a business trip East.

Ross & Coons, of Chicago, have purchased the Lilly Theater, Bass Lake, Ind. This theater will now be devoted to motion pictures exclusively. Film service and complete equipment has been furnished by the Standard Film Exchange of Chicago. The house is provided with a Fairbanks-Morse electric lighting plant. Admission charged will be 10 cents.

Robert T. Mathurin, of Chicago, has purchased the Mozart Theater, 2840 W. Van Buren Street.

A new theater is going to be opened this week, at 7251 Vincennes Road. Troyer & Krugmann are the proprietors.

The American Cinematograph Co., of Chicago, has greatly enlarged its offices and plant, and occupies considerable floor space in the Electrical Building, Jackson Boulevard and Desplaines Street. Captain Boenning will be pleased to entertain his callers in his new private office.

Doings at Los Angeles

Our Correspondent Comes To Life With a Newsy Letter. Much Doing on the Coast.

AFTER considering two other locations in this city, Wilbert Melville, producing manager of the Lubin Western branch, has decided to remain indefinitely at 4550 Pasadena, where the company has had its studio since last December. Mr. Melville had purchased a five-acre tract of ground in South Pasadena, a suburb adjoining Los Angeles, and had prepared plans for all the buildings necessary for a complete modern studio, but the villagers have strong objections to motion pictures and motion picture companies and raised such opposition that Mr. Melville promptly announced that he would not locate in a hostile section and disposed of the property. South Pasadena is the village which for three years barred even motion picture theaters. Following this episode, Mr. Melville visited different sections of Los Angeles only to come to the final conclusion that his present location is the most advantageous one to be found. As soon as he decided to stay, a force of workmen was turned into the grounds and extensive improvements were begun. These already include a new stage 50 by 60 feet and five new buildings. Mr. Melville has also organized a feature company, which he will take to San Diego and San Francisco, where he will produce a series of naval and military pictures of a spectacular nature. The other two producers will remain at the studio.

With all but the two critical scenes finished, one of the Lubin directors went to work one morning this week and found that an essential "prop" was missing. The picture in hand was being made at the seaport town of San Pedro. Most of the action was framed to take place in and around a tramp schooner. A number of scenes had been taken showing the name of the ship. At night when the company stopped work only two or three scenes remained to be made, but they were supposed to be made on the deck while the boat was far out at sea. The schooner was scheduled to sail for South America at 10 o'clock next morning. The director arranged to be at the dock with his company at 9:30 to go aboard and be taken a few miles out. A launch was chartered to return the company to land. Arriving at the dock at 9:30 the company found the schooner gone. A seaman told them that the ship had sailed about daylight. There was no sign of it on the horizon. Fortunately the chartered launch was ready to steam up, and fortunately, too, it was a speedy craft. The director and his actors got aboard the launch and began a chase. Three or four hours later they came in sight of it and still later overhauled the schooner and were taken aboard. Every man on board except the captain was gloriously drunk and the captain explained that he had sailed ahead of time because if he had waited longer he would not have been able to collect a crew. One of the scenes called for an actor to fall overboard. When it was taken one of the intoxicated seaman went overboard with a splash to rescue him. One by one the other sailors followed until there were six or seven men struggling in the water all fighting to rescue the actor, Henry King, the leading man. When the company finally returned to land it was late at night.

The departure of the Biograph company on its annual pilgrimage to New York was a big event in motion picture circles this year. The organization left from the Santa Fe station the morning of June 28. About 200 persons connected in one way or other with the motion picture industry were on the platform to say good-by. There was a big delegation from The Photoplayers' Club and nearly every studio in Southern California was represented. This is the latest the Biograph company has ever gone back since it began coming to Los Angeles every winter. One of the things that detained the company beyond its usual leaving time was a three-reel spectacle which was completed only a day before. It is a picture of Biblical times called "Judith." The leading character is the Judith of the Scriptures. D. W. Griffith made it, which is another way of saying that it will be a thoroughly artistic production. It is said to be the first three-reel feature ever made by the Biograph company. Among the motion picture fraternity it has long been a subject of speculation what Griffith could do if he had three full reels in which to spread himself. "Judith" will give an answer to this question. What the cost of the picture will be probably has never been figured up, but the expenditures have been lavish. In one set, it is said, upward of 2,000 extra people were used and the cast called for practically the full Biograph organization, a thing that has never happened before. From the studio come bits of gossip about the picture, one, for instance, that Griffith has interpreted the racial character of the Jews with rare sympathy and understanding.

After a tour of the Orient and the South Sea Islands, the Melies organization is back on the Pacific Coast. The main company is at Santa Paula where the studio is located, but a number of the actors are scattered about between San Francisco and Los Angeles taking brief vacations. There is about to be a complete reorganization of the company, it is said. Gaston Melies, for so long the head of the company, and himself one of the pioneer producers of the industry, resigned from the position he has occupied on the day the steamer arrived in San Francisco. He has contemplated retirement from active business for more than two years and finally decided to put it off no longer. His son, Paul, who has assisted Gaston for a long time, will probably succeed to the vacant place. It is understood that for the time being the company will remain in this country making regular releases from the Santa Paula studio.

One of the men who returned with the company is Hugh C. McClung, of Los Angeles, who, for the last five months, was the principal producer under Mr. Melies. McClung joined as a camera man at the time the company sailed from San Francisco. Later he was put in full charge of the technical department and then was made a director. He resigned from the organization in Japan, but returned with the company. He has plans afoot for the formation of a producing and distributing company to serve a new market which he discovered while abroad and is said to have enough British capital behind him to assure a success in the undertaking. He is expecting to sail for China in a couple of weeks.

Aubrey M. Kennedy, formerly general manager of the Pacific Coast branch of the Universal company, is now in Calgary, Canada, as exclusive distributor of Universal films for all Canada. The agency is said to be one of the most valuable in the world and those who know something about the business say that his contract is one which will make him a large fortune within five years. The exchange business is one that he knows from the ground up. He was one of the pioneers in it in Chicago several years ago. J. W. Engel succeeded Mr. Kennedy temporarily as general manager of the Universal plant here.

W. Hanson Durham, scenario editor of the Western Vitagraph company—or, rather—companies, at Santa Monica, has returned to his desk at the studio after an absence of nearly three months. On March 8 he paid his first visit to the club rooms of The Photoplayers, and before he had been in the building five minutes he slipped on a steep staircase and fell down a flight of stairs. One of his knees was broken and for several weeks thereafter he performed his duties in a hospital room. To keep three active directors busy is no snap for a well man, but Durham managed to hold the job down without assistance during all the time he was incapacitated.

The adoption of a new constitution and by-laws made it necessary for The Photoplayers to elect four additional members on the board of control, making fifteen in all. There were nine nominations for the places—Henry Otto, Jack O'Brien, Allan Dwan, J. E. Le Saint, Al Filson, George Gebhart, J. A. Crosby, Marshall Neilan and Wilbert Melville. Mr. Melville withdrew because he has plans which will require him to be absent from the city for some time and the balloting resulted in the election of Otto, Filson, Crosby and O'Brien.

All of the members of the big Universal organization participated in a moonlight dance the night of June 19, when the new stage at the Hollywood studio, said to be the largest motion picture stage in the world, was dedicated. The stage was decorated with Japanese lanterns and bunting and there was a band of sixteen pieces.

About People.

Richard Willis, formerly scenario editor of the Universal company and more recently incumbent of the same position with the Powers organization at Hollywood, is now examining scripts for the Majestic company.

Ford Sterling, principal comedian of the Keystone company, was kept out of a couple of pictures because of severe burns on both hands. The accident occurred when a taxicab, which was being used in a scene, caught fire in the gasoline tank. Sterling was inside at the time.

Arthur Mackley, Essanay director, arrived safely in Scotland, judging by postcards which a number of his friends have been receiving.

Assistant Director Cabanet, of the Biograph company, who has been working under D. W. Griffith, is "assistant" no longer. Just before the organization departed for the East, Cabanet took out a company of 80 persons and made his first picture, which turned out to be a highly creditable production.

Bub Duncan was one of the Biographers who did not journey East with the company. He, too, is a director, having signed up with the J. A. Crosby Company to make split-reel comedies.

James A. Crosby, by the way, has the exclusive agency for Bell & Howell cameras and other devices in Southern California.

Joseph De Grasse, formerly leading man and later director with the West Coast Pathe company, has joined Melville's Lubin organization as a director.

Shirley Hull, formerly leading man with Billie Burke, has been engaged to play the lead in the Majestic six-reel production of "Sappho."

Tom Evans and Bob Ross, of the Powers company, attended; a Japanese auction at Venice. By careful team work they made such excellent use of the circumstance that the law requires articles to be sold after there have been two bids, that they purchased $800 worth of curios for something over $200. At least that is what they believe, although the artful Jap auctioneer believes they purchased about $40 worth of goods for something over $200.

Edwin August directed a picture a few days ago in which there were several scenes calling for a bunch of college boys. The extra people on hand did not look the parts and so several of August's brother directors, who were temporarily idle, volunteered to work for him. Among them were Bob Leonard, Allan Dwan, Jack O'Brien and Al Christie. August worked them like horses all afternoon until they were sick of their bargain and then paid them one dollar apiece.

Virginia Chester has finally recovered from a broken ankle and is again playing parts with the Pathe company.

F. G. Grandon, formerly a Lubin director and then for a few weeks with the Universal, is giving Selig a trial.

Gray Oliver, who worked in Kinemacolor pictures under Director E. J. Le Saint, is again working under him at the Selig studio.

It is reported here that the Kinemacolor company may resume operations in Los Angeles about the middle of August.

Director Henry McRae is at work on the first of a series of animal pictures which the Universal will issue, using about 100 wild animals which have just arrived here. McRae, it will be remembered, made several of the notable Selig animal pictures.

A NEW LEADING MAN FOR SELIG.

Clifford Bruce has been engaged to play "leads" with the Selig Polyscope Company at their studio in Chicago. He comes as a well qualified actor with six years' active and almost continuous experience on Broadway—"Sine qua non" of success in stage service. He was five years in the Frohman service in principal parts played with William Gillette in his farewell tour and succeeded Kyril Bellew in "The Thief," playing a leading roll three years. His last staring tour was in "The Virginian." A man of fine appearance and with keen dramatic sense he should be a very desirable addition in his new capacity to show the shadow for the substance.

THE SECOND FEALY FILM.

"Little Dorrit" after Dickens, has been selected by Thanhouser as the vehicle for Maude Fealy's second picture dip. It will be released late in the month, making with "King Rene's Daughter," two three-reel Fealy features in July alone. The Thanhouser Kidlet will play the title role in the early portion of the picture. In July comes "Tannhauser," a three-reeler after the opera, in which Marguerite Snow and James Cruze are principals.

EMPIRE PICTURES—A NEW BRAND COMING.

Beginning September 1st, the New York Motion Picture Company, which now produces Kay-Bee, Broncho and Keystone films, will release Empire films. This is a new brand which will be produced by the New York Motion Picture Company in accordance with its contract with the Mutual Film Corporation, made several weeks ago, by the terms of which the present output of six reels is to be increased to twelve reels.

"The Greed of Osman Bey."

An Edison Drama of the Orient.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

A dull story brightened by exquisite settings, marvelous costumes and acting that is up to the limited requirements of the roles. Gertrude McCoy, Barry O'Moore and Bigelow Cooper show that they are capable of much greater things by getting all there is to be had out of the parts assigned them, and almost altogether their personality and the care shown in production is responsible for what satisfies the eye. Most of the scenes are very pleasing, there is abundant art shown in the portrayal, but there is very little of live interest to portray.

Scene from "The Greed of Osman Bey" (Edison).

Osman Bey is supposed to be greedy and short of funds, when an individual supposed to be a "prince of the desert," Ahmet by name, arrives with his princely suite of one attendant. He promptly falls in love with Zulika, daughter of Osman Bey, and bribes his way into the garden only to find that she and he are two angles of the eternal one, the other being a rich rug merchant in high favor with pa-pah. Without the trappings, the same thing can be seen three hundred and sixty-five times a year at the picture shows. Ahmet is cautious enough to send his attendant back for his father's permission to marriage, and incautious enough to woo the unveiled young lady before the very eyes of his rival.

Scene from "The Greed of Osman Bey" (Edison).

Ahmet is cast into jail and walled up. The attendant returns in time for the master to catch his breath and brings news that Ahmet's father has died and left him a great fortune. Osman Bey promptly ejects the rug merchant and, in consideration of receiving a bag of money from Ahmet, turns his daughter over to the more fortunate suitor.

Exposition Huge Success.

Exhibitors at First Motion Picture Exposition a Unit in Declaring the Value of the Exposition—No Discontent.

WHATEVER comment may be in other directions, there were no two opinions as to the success of the Motion Picture Exposition, both as a means of bringing the advancement of the business more prominently before the public and in respect to the direct financial returns to those whose exhibits contributed to the instruction of the public.

A few of the general public who came in the expectation of seeing pictures being taken expressed mild disapproval until they had made the rounds and had realized the immensity of the entertainment offered them. Then even this slight discontent vanished; lost in a general admiration of the scheme as a whole.

It is rarely that a first undertaking is such a complete and satisfying exhibition and perhaps the most sincere compliment paid the management comes from C. C. Sweeney, of the United Electric Light and Power Company, a veteran exhibitor at expositions of all sorts, who declared the showing both as a display and as a business bringer, to be far ahead of the Electrical Show, which has been running for a number of years.

In varying degrees this opinion is voiced by all. A representative of the Moving Picture World spent the better part of the last day getting the opinions of the various exhibitors. It was not possible to locate them all in the turmoil of the getaway, nor always to find the highest authority at each booth, but all of those interviewed are well qualified to speak and their remarks represent the consensus of opinion and speak so strongly for themselves that they are given without further comment:

Bell & Howell—Frank M. Bryam—We are more than gratified with the results of the exposition, not alone in the volume of actual business transacted, but in the large number of prospects developed. We came into the exposition merely to show our goods and familiarize possible purchasers with their merits against a subsequent campaign, but we are taking home practically nothing but orders, as all of the machines on display have been disposed of, to say nothing of orders for duplication. Our only complaint is that at times the musical exhibits have made the transaction of business impossible.

Excelsior Drum Works—Sam Lapin—We did not expect to make many sales, but this is the only way to get your goods before the right people and we entered purely as an advertisement, but not only have we made wonderful progress in familiarizing theater owners with our effects machine, but we have made nine sales right here in the hall and one man, who visited early in the week, telegraphed back an order and followed it up with a check. We have had to get in our display at odd times while the organ just across the way was silent, but we have had a most satisfying week.

Automatic Coin Cashier Co.—J. H. Hibner—We have had a very good week indeed. We found a greater and more intelligent interest than we anticipated.

Koerting & Mathiesen—Joseph Brownstein—We are delighted with results. We came here to meet the out-of-town exhibitors with whom we want to get into personal touch. They were here in surprising numbers and from remote points. We have made sales as well as new friends.

Nicholas Power Machine Co.—Will S. Smith—The Powers Cameragraph is 6 A. The exposition is A-1. We are surprised at the intelligent interest. Next time we shall make an even more elaborate display.

Typhoon Fan Co.—Ernst Glantzberg—The feature to me is the intelligent interest shown by the visitors. The merely curious have not bothered us. On the other hand we have interested many beside theater owners.

National Cash Register Co.—Charles Knese—The exhibition has been entirely satisfactory. The interest shown in our new automatic ticket dispenser has been sincere and general.

Whyte-Whitman Co.—S. Baker—This more than meets our expectations. Every promise has been more than lived up to. We have sold one of the display cameras to Christian Leden, who will take it north of 71 degrees in an exploration of northern Canada for the Canadian government. Other machines on display have been sold to the National Cash Register Co., and our books show many large orders as well as prospects.

American Theater and Display Co.—George W. Armstrong—Business has been great. I am sorry for the man who stayed out of this. He missed a great opportunity to get business.

Zalmuz Disinfecting Spray—Sol. Hymes—We were a little late in getting here but even with that handicap we have done business and have met men from all parts of the country, to say nothing of visitors from Japan, Australia and Mexico.

Newman Manufacturing Co.—W. J. Newman—Business has exceeded expectations. Sam and E. R. Newman have also been on the ground and I guess we have met everybody here. Our novelties have attracted general attention and we have been not a little surprised at the familiarity shown with our general line.

American Seating Co.—L. J. Gaffney—When we can get orders from Mexico as well as points nearer home, you cannot expect us to complain. We are delighted with the results.

Rudolph Wurlitzer Co.—G. W. Skee—The exposition has more than met our expectation. We cannot well carry around the Unit Orchestra in a sample case and this has been a most excellent opportunity for the demonstration of the device.

Johns-Manville—W. W. Walker—The exposition has been a howling success not alone from a personal point of view, but as a spectacle.

United States Lithograph Co.—J. C. Trauth—Our only regret is that we did not take a larger space and make a complete showing. This is a mistake that will be corrected next year. We have closed about $150,000 in business, but, better still, we have come into personal contact with the man who actually uses our paper, and he has told us what he wants, and that information alone would be well worth the time and trouble. It is the theater owner who really knows what pulls business into his house and we shall be in a better position than ever to meet all tastes.

Spray Ozone Co.—Arthur H. Avery—We did not expect to do more than show what our spray could do, and we would have been content with that, but we have done a nice business besides.

Warner's Features—V. B. Johnson—One result of our display will be the creation of two exchanges in Canada to care for business across the border. We have completed the sales of "Theodora" in every State. We are tickled to death.

Ernest Boecker—I have been in personal charge of this booth the entire week, for it affords me an invaluable opportunity for getting into personal touch with prospects. It has been a great success.

Mirror Screen Co.—J. W. Barlow—The exposition has uncovered for us a volume of business entirely beyond our expectations. One feature of the week has been the inquiries and actual purchases of colleges and schools. For the use of schools and scientific societies the Mirror Screen is without an equal since such nicety of definition is required. We did not expect much of this business from the exposition, but we got it. The other big surprise was the universal courtesy of you New Yorkers, not alone in the exposition hall, but on the streets.

Novelty Slide Company—F. G. Wiley—We have done about three times the volume of business we anticipated. It is an absolute success in every way.

Picture Theater Equipment Co.—W. Brinkman—We have done splendidly. If I land a reasonable percentage of my prospects in the next three months, I'll lay off on my commissions until the next exposition.

Thomas A. Edison, Inc.—John Hardin—It has exceeded our fondest expectations and has shown the tremendous hold the pictures have on the general public. We have had a most successful week in every way.

Wyanoak Publishing Co.—Louis Blum—It could not well have been bettered. We have made a number of agencies and some contracts that are worth while.

Automatic Cash Register and Ticket Co.—D. Harold Finkelstein—It is a great scheme to show ticket machines under actual conditions. We have made many sales, including an initial order to Australia. That's going some.

Menger & Ring—Leopold Heubsch—We have no complaint to make. There has been a decided interest in our exhibit and many theater owners have made the discovery that brass is not the last word in frames, particularly where photographs are to be displayed.

Rex Film Renovator Co.—J. D. Weirich—We have developed some excellent prospects. Our machine does not appeal, save indirectly, to the theater manager, but we have shown them that there is no excuse for dirty commercials. This will help us in the long run to place our machines with the exchanges.

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

IT is safe to say that no body of delegates that ever visited a national convention in this city returned to their homes better pleased and satisfied with their visit than those who attended the recent moving picture exhibitors' convention and exposition. It is claimed by those who undertook to note any comments that might be made by the visitors during their stay here, so that any oversights or errors in the arrangements for receptions and entertainments could be promptly rectified, that not one delegate gave any intimation of disappointment or dissatisfaction, and that if any of the delegates, or guests, had a grouch it was taken home under cover. It was certainly a great week and the results were as gratifying to the hosts as they were to the guests. The home people are entitled to all the credit and compliments that can be given them, for not a word of criticism has been heard at home regarding the arrangements for the reception and entertainment of the visitors, or the manner in which they were carried out. It was a big undertaking, the number of visitors was very large, the programme for their welfare was a big and varied one, embracing several trips on land and water, banquets and luncheons, tours to and inspections of moving picture studios, receptions at the exposition, and none in charge of the arrangements have been heard regretting that this thing or the other was overlooked. It was the first trip to the city for many of the visitors and they returned to their homes with a better understanding of why the old town is called "the great metropolis." One Western delegate said: "It is sure some place. What surprises me is that it has so few imposing picture houses in proportion to its size and other attractions. In that respect the West and Middle West have you beaten to a frazzle." He was told there has been so much tomfoolery in connection with ordinances applying to the construction of picture houses that people who could afford to erect the better class of structures hesitated about making the investments, but, thanks to Mayor Gaynor, an ordinance has been secured that will throw open the doors for investments. "Mayor Gaynor, eh?" was the Westerner's next remark. "Well, he sure is some mayor on the moving picture business. Why, I had to laugh when I heard him say in his speech at the convention that he had no notion he was known outside of New York. I guess the mayor doesn't read the Moving Picture World. Us outsiders know all about what he has done for you moving picture people and we have taken some good tips from it. But, aside from that, have you ever realized that we out-of-town folks know as much, and sometimes more, of what is going on in your city than your own people do. It's a fact. Why, when we come here and ask you to open your box of tricks and show us "the sights" you have to stop and think of where you will take us; but we can tell you right off the reel what we want to see. We remember what we read and you become forgetful of your surroundings."

The aggregation of moving picture exhibitors and friends touring about the city during convention week afforded food for reflection on the part of the people who have been making the rights of the moving picture people of this city a secondary matter to political considerations. They must have seen that the exhibitors and others connected with the "movies" form a very respectable part of the population of this and other states and cities, numerically and otherwise, and if forced by political persecution to strike back, they have the goods.

A band of crooks that had studied the programme for the entertainment of the visitors followed them all week like hungry sharks following a vessel. No serious losses were reported. The Vitagraph company got wise to the situation and had a number of plain clothes men scattered about the grounds when the 1,400 or more visitors arrived at the studios. Within an hour after the arrival, the sleuths rounded up a bunch of pickpockets before they could get in their work and marched them to the railroad station.

Although President Neff, in his annual report to the National Convention, recommended a special session of the body to discuss the censor question and he continues making the subject a hobby, personal talks with delegates outside the convention hall revealed a strong sentiment in favor of non-interference with the present system. The day before the final session there was a big distribution of badges reading "Down with censorship." Mayor Gaynor's statement before the convention that compulsory censorship has not at any time belonged to our free government was a clincher for those who had been thrown in doubt by the statement of ex-Governor Foraker, of Ohio, some time ago that he was not prepared to say censorship is unconstitutional, as he had not looked the matter up. Mayor Gaynor's declaration was positive and emphatic. A delegate remarked after the address, "Although I do not now live in New York, I know Judge Gaynor to be an able lawyer. I was one of those in doubt on the constitutional question, but now that I have the decision from Judge Gaynor's own lips my mind is made up."

A number of delegates seated in a hotel one night during convention week were discussing the persistent and unreasonable opposition to moving pictures that is still manifested on the part of some people, particularly by some people connected with religious organizations. A Brooklyn exhibitor had this to say: "I can see the time coming when these people will be forced to take a more conservative view of this and other public matters. They are steadily bringing on the issue by their own unreasonable actions. There is a church building in Brooklyn occupying an entire plot of 100 x 100 feet. It has been vacant for about two years. The congregation ceased to be self-supporting and consolidated with another congregation. The property is owned by what is known as "the home church," located in another part of Brooklyn. There is no picture house within four or five blocks of the site and no other church within three blocks. The property is for sale but repeated offers for it have been refused because "the home church" will not permit it to be converted into a moving picture theater. I claim this is a "dog in the manger" act and cannot be justified by any reasonable argument. Why, it is just such biased policies that will eventually prove a boomerang to those who practice them. Many people, myself included, have been giving the matter serious thought from a taxpayer's standpoint of view, particularly since discussions have recently come up about church properties being exempt from taxation, although the holders have become enormously wealthy and are increasing that wealth every year. They sell one church property that has greatly increased in valuation, buy another, and sell that when it increases. "What is good for the goose is good for the gander," as the old saying goes, and when a congregation goes into the real estate business it should not be allowed to indulge in the restraint of trade. A legitimate buyer for a legitimate purpose should have an opportunity to buy when he is ready to pay the asking price. That property I refer to is not used for religious purposes and should bear the burden of taxation with the rest of the property owners of the city. If the owners do not want to pay taxes then let them sell the property to those who will."

ESSANAY'S ITHACA STUDIO.

It will be news to most that Essanay has invaded the East and has a field studio at Ithaca, N. Y. Thomas W. Wharton is in charge with Francis X. Bushman as leading man, and they came down to the Exposition for Chicago night.

"I've had my eye on Ithaca for a long time," explained Mr. Wharton, "and this summer we decided to go there. We have everything but the ocean and that is not so far away. There is the lake, some seventeen waterfalls, all the way from fifteen to one hundred and fifty feet in height, woods, mountains, meadows and beautiful grounds as well as the handsome establishment of Cornell University. We expect to do some fine educational work in conjunction with the University, and we are having splendid success.

"Bushman doesn't like the waterfalls because we threw him over one of the lower ones the other day. He is all black and blue, but it made a fine scene. You want to watch for some of that stuff. It is going to be worth while."

Both Mr. Wharton and Mr. Bushman are as brown as berries from their outdoor work.

The Frese Camera

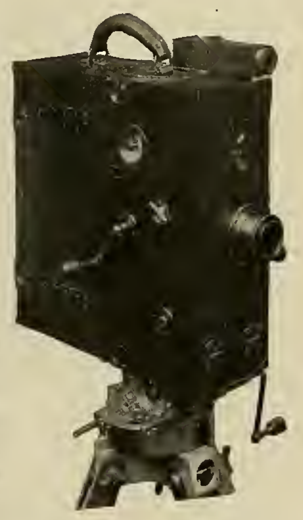
A Professional Instrument That is Built for Utility, With Several Improvements and Conveniences.

By Hugh Hoffman.

THE Frese camera is a modest looking instrument, without any frills or fancy brass work. It is built for taking moving pictures and every consideration of appearance has been made secondary to completeness of result. It is not a bad looking box by any means; in fact, it is a very neat affair, built of Japanese teakwood and trimmed with gun metal. There is nothing about it to tarnish, and the teakwood is weatherproof, for which reason it was selected.

At booth No. 323, at the recent Exposition in New York, Mr. J. B. Smith, one of the oldest and best known cameramen in the country, was in charge, representing Rice & Einstein, of Berkeley, Cal., makers of the Frese camera. Mr. Smith went over the camera and explained enthusiastically all its fine points, of which there are many.

One of the best features about this instrument is the mechanism, which is made to work both ways by merely reversing the direction of the crank. The gearing is so arranged that the reverse is entirely complete without changing the belt or anything else. The belt is continuous and operates both magazines at once, which makes film buckling practically impossible. As an added precaution the grooves of all pulleys over which the spring take-up belt passes are roughened or milled, like the edge of a coin. This prevents any slipping of the belt. All gears are brass of the best consistency and are skilfully made.



This camera has an adjustable aperture plate which can be shifted up or down for use in double exposure work without changing the position of the camera, or to make it agree with the focus of any other camera that may have been used on the same spot previously. The intermittent movement is of the claw or beater type and operates without a particle of noise. The aperture plate track is slightly countersunk in that portion that lies before the image. By this means the only friction that comes upon the film is at the sides by the perforations. It is claimed that this eliminates static entirely, or confines it to that part of the film that does not show on the screen.

The camera is divided into three distinct compartments. On the crank side a compartment extends from front to back, having a width of about two inches. The intermittent movement occupies the small forward compartment on the other side, and the magazines occupy the rear compartment on the same side, back of the intermittent compartment. By means of removable panels it is easy to get at any part of the mechanism on either side. The sides are all panels, any of which is immediately removable, and yet when in position they are light proof. On the crank side is an accurate film gauge. Also on this side is a perforating device that stamps a round hole in the middle of the film inside when a scene is finished. This perforation is of much help in the dark room in finding the end of the scene without delay. On the crank side also is something with which very few regular cameras are equipped. It is a single exposure crank for use in making trick pictures. One turn of this small crank gives a single exposure.

The selection of the lens is left to the purchaser if he has a preference for any certain kind, otherwise a high grade lens is furnished with the instrument, equipped with diaphragm and time gauge. There are two finders; one set in a long gun metal hood on the top of the camera, and the other on the off side near the front, that reflects at an angle from a point very near the lens. This side focus does away with the awkward method of focusing through a long tube from the back.

The tripod is a very substantial apparatus and is made with all the precision of a surveyor's instrument. It can be extended to an altitude of six feet and is equipped with a tilting and panorama gear. Another new point of great convenience is the absence of the old thumb-screw connection between the tripod and the camera box. This connection on the Frese camera is made by means of a long, wide, dovetail tongue and groove. The camera slides on horizontally, and is held rigidly to the tripod at the greater part of its bottom area, thus reducing vibration, and eliminating any fussing with an inaccessible thumb-screw.

The Frese camera comes in two sizes; the large size, for studio work, will take 400 feet of raw stock and the smaller size, for field work, will take 200 feet. The price of each of these sizes is the same, $350.00, for the reason that the workmanship on each is the same, the only difference in material being a little extra wood. The small size was designed for camera men who prefer a lighter camera for field work and traveling. The tripod is $100.00 extra and extra magazines are $7.00 and $8.00, according to size.

Generally speaking, it is a pretty fine instrument and is built for business. The money that might have been put into fancy trimmings has been put into higher efficiency for the camera man, who cares more about the inside perfection of his machine than he does about looks or outside finish.

THE LUBIN STUDIO AT LOS ANGELES.

The Western branch of the Lubin Manufacturing Company is located at 4550 Pasadena Avenue, Los Angeles, Cal. The studio is beautifully situated and combines with attractive environment, accessibility to a marked degree. The buildings are located upon a beautiful, well-kept plot of ground, 150 x 450 feet, which presents all the picturesque beauty and variety of coloring usually found in California Gardens. In the rear, a large stage, 80 feet square, around which is grouped commodious prop room, wardrobe room, scene dock, paint bridge, etc., supplies the facilities for the interior sets. Adjacent to this are the stables and corrals where the horses, saddles and equestrian equipment is kept. In front is a large and handsomely furnished building of the Colonial type which furnishes quarters for offices, dressing rooms, green room, etc. All in all, it is one of the most attractive and best arranged studios in Los Angeles, and the Lubin Company has been complimented upon its attractive and business-like arrangement. In the rear of the studio are the tracks of the Salt Lake Route. An attractive private station has been built there affording facilities for the arrival and departure of characters by train in the photoplays. The station has been named "Lowry" in honor of Mr. I. M. Lowry, general manager of the firm.

LITTLE RUNA HODGES ON THE ROAD.

The little four-year-old star, Runa Hodges, who is being presented in a series of Runa pictures by the Reliance Company, has been appearing in the larger moving picture theaters in Boston and several other New England cities.

Manager J. V. Ritchey has had so many requests from exhibitors to give their patrons an opportunity of seeing little Runa "in the flesh" that he allowed her a couple of weeks' vacation from the studio to accompany her mother on the present tour.

Much to everybody's surprise, Runa is not satisfied with merely making a bow to her audiences, but insists upon being a "regular actress."

A letter from Manager J. L. Roth, of the Olympic Theater, Boston, states that Runa walked out upon the stage like an old-timer and in tones that could be heard in the back of the house told the audience how glad she was to meet them.

WARNER'S FEATURE NOTES.

Well, it's over—the First International Exposition of the Moving Picture Art—but the memory of its big days and nights still lingers with us. A list of those exhibitors who called at our booth for particulars regarding Warner's Features would fill two of these pages; suffice it to say that they came from every State in the Union—boosting Warner's Features like the good fellows they are.

On Wednesday and Friday evenings, Miss Gene Gauntier and Jack J. Clark presided, assisted by the members of the firm. Miss Gauntier has lost none of her popularity since turning her entire attention to the production of three-reel features; indeed, she seems to have increased it fourfold.

Exhibitors residing within a radius of New Orleans, take note that our branch office in that city has removed to more commodious quarters at 151 Baronne Street. J. A. Nicoll continues in charge.

Keep your attention riveted on Warner's Feature Film Company from this time on; some big surprises are in store for you and they are going to be sprung very soon.

Advertising for Exhibitors

We Pass.

THINGS do move, now and then. We have been advocating the formation of a League of Photoplay Program Publishers with somewhat discouraging success, but now comes Bertram I. Williams, of Ponca City, Oklahoma, to the point and with his usual breeziness of style. This is what Mr. Williams writes:

> I just received a letter from our friend, Jack Nash, of the Isis, in Trinidad, Colo. In it, he, among other things, says that he hasn't gotten out an Isis News for about two weeks, but that he will hit you on the side of the head with a new one about next Saturday.
> We have been corresponding about the organization of that "Photoplay Theater Editor's Press Club," which you advocated in a recent issue of the World. It seems to hit both of us as a peach of an idea, and we would like to go to work on it and see what we can do out in this section of the country on that proposition. Now, Friend Nash has about 128 names on his exchange list, and I have 146. We are going to boost in every way that we can, and would like to have you do the same.
> How about getting out membership cards, and having the different editors run a line in their editorial head acknowledging their membership. I can get out the cards here at no cost at all, and put up a pretty flossy article at that For a cooperative proposition and a help to the boys, I don't know as there could be a better idea. We noticed that you said that you didn't care to start it yourself, so please don't be mad if we butt in a little, because we both need help in that line.
> I know that you are an awfully busy man, but if you would just forego smoking that last cigar of yours along about 2:30 A. M., before you go to your downy couch, and drop me a line, giving me some pointers on your idea, I would very much appreciate it. You may, with my permission, draw on the "Club" treasury for your salary. It takes at least two weeks for us to hear anything through the columns of the World, and we want to get busy as soon as possible.

Mr. Nash, be it remembered, is the proprietor of the Isis Theater, Trinidad, Colorado, and published the Isis News until the printer raised the rates on him. He is now waiting for the printer to waken from his deep sleep and come to terms again. His last letter, as does his to Mr. Williams, hints that it will not be long before the publication resumes. We shall be glad, not alone because it feeds us material for this department, but because we enjoy reading the snappy little sheet. There are a lot of exhibitors who can turn out as good copy as regular newspaper men, not because they are newspaper men but because they do not try to be, but merely put their personality on paper. Of course, there are others like Mr. Williams, Mr. Nash, Mr. Smithers and whoever it is that gets out the Cameraphone Bulletins (we wish he would stick his head out of the water for a moment) who have had newspaper training.

Just Part of the Job.

Mr. Williams should have known better than to tell us to take first whack at the club treasury. This department, like THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD itself, is run for the good of the photoplay business. It is for the benefit of the exhibitor and we are not trying to create a "side line" in suggesting the organization of this league. It is merely that we want to see the houses get the most value for their money spent in advertising the houses, and we know that some national advertising can be gotten if the circulation can be offered in a lump instead of in fractions of the lowest unit of 100,000. This can be done only through combination and we have plugged away at the matter in spite of the seemingly slow response, because we believe that it will bring into being other bright publications that will not only advertise the house by which it is published but the photoplay business as a whole. Anything that tends to make fans and keep up their interest in the plays is good for the business and anything that is good for the business helps to pay this paper the money it pays us. We are at the disposal of the league, not only in its process of formation but at all times. We are heart and soul with the movement and we will be content with such honor as comes from being its god-father. We want to be an honorary member with the right to wear a badge and attend conventions, but we stop there.

Let Bert Do It.

We have received two offers to take hold of the matter, this from Mr. Williams and the other from Julian L. Solomon, Jr., of Philadelphia. We are more in favor of Mr. Williams as promoter for two reasons. In the first place he is a westerner and 90% of these publications are printed west of the Alleghenies. In the second place, Mr. Williams has had the greater experience. Mr. Solomon is in touch with some of the agencies handling the national advertising, but he lacks the all-round experience that Mr. Williams possesses. We do not urge Mr. Williams' candidacy, but he is already in touch with several of the live wires and seems to have made progress. He should line up with Benny Pulitzer, of New Orleans, and some of the others, now. As he points out, it involves considerable delay in handing matter through this department and he should be addressed direct.

What We Think.

We do not see that at the moment membership cards are important. The fact of membership is more important than the card, but we do favor the suggestion that each publication run a line to the effect that it is a member of the League of Photoplay Program Publishers. Membership might more properly lie with the publication than with the publisher, but this is not a very important question. The use of such a line would give dignity to the paper using it and help readers to realize that the paper was but one of a link. Many daily publications take pride in advertising their connection with the Associated Press.

While the obtaining of national advertising is one of the most attractive objects to be gained, we believe that this should not be the sole nor even the foremost aim of the league. Mutual assistance and improvement should be the chief object and this may be attained in many ways. In the first place there is the matter of copy. A great deal of matter might be prepared by the members and sent to the head office to be duplicated and supplied to the other members. It may not be feasible to send out such matter in matrix form since type faces and column widths of the different papers vary so greatly. Unless some uniform style could be arrived at—and this would not always be possible—the mat idea would not work. On the other hand most publishers would welcome short, snappy paragraphs of live interest, brief readers "boosting" the pictures in general, perhaps a series of personality sketches and similar material. This would help out the local material and reduce the labor of editing to a minimum.

Cuts and Other Matter.

Cuts, too, could be supplied at small cost in comparison with the prices charged at present for electros. It would not be feasible at the start to supply cuts of scenes from plays, but cuts of the players could be supplied at a very slight advance over the original cost to cover postage and mailing box, and a decided reduction might be effected in this direction. The fact that there must be three sets of cuts made of the Universal, Mutual and Licensed players would not figure for enough of each could be ordered at one time to effect a decided reduction and should a star play tag with the various interests as Edwin August has been doing of late, the cuts made of Mr. August in the belief that he was a Vitagraph player could be turned over to the Universal clients and perhaps sent the Mutual later on.

The cost might be further reduced by devising some system of exchange, the cuts being passed along, according to a regular schedule, to several members before their usefulness is destroyed by press work.

In the case of publications using covers, the combination of a dozen members to purchase a million lithographed covers would bring the cost down to almost what a plain cover paper would cost in small lots and a saving in white paper might also be effected where several theaters placed their orders at one time.

Primarily the suggestion was made for the editors of actual house organs rather than mere programs, but the greater benefits would be derived from a larger membership that included all publications issued at least once each week and carrying advertising matter.

There is a splendid opportunity here for the live wires to get together and galvanize into life the dead lines. We shall be glad to give space to discussion and comment and we hope that when the next convention of exhibitors is held the press men will come along for the press club convention.

Handling the Ads.

In obtaining the advertising, comparatively few persons must be dealt with since the bulk of the advertising is in the hands of a few agencies and these alone will have to be dealt with in arranging for advertising. Proof must be shown that the circulation is what it is stated to be and payment will be made in a single check, less the commission for the agent, since the agent's profit comes from the advertising and not from the advertiser.

Not all kinds of advertising may be had because there are classes of advertising and one may find the Saturday Evening Post at $15 a line a better medium than fifteen hundred publications at one cent a line each, though the aggregate circulation may be double the circulation offered by the Post.

At the same time much advertising may be had that goes into the theater program advertising, though this will be more or less of an uphill climb since some of the advertising used in the Motion Picture Story Magazine has given the big advertisers the idea that motion picture advertising will not pay because of the quality of the audiences.

It is not necessary to point out that for a publication to reach the homes of the moderately well to do the motion picture paper will make a more general appeal to the class desired than even the Saturday Evening Post, for in the towns that can support a house organ the "picture paper" is found of greater interest than even the well edited Philadelphia publication.

That's what we think about it all. It's up to the league.

Two Features.

Benny Pulitzer, who does the press work for the Pearce Theaters, New Orleans, sends a special four page folder gotten out to proclaim the fact that the Bijou Dream was showing two features on one bill. "The Vampire of the Desert" and "The Yaqui Cur." This is going plenty for the summer time and the bill is well done except that Mr. Pulitzer shut his eyes to the fact that three of the lines, the two titles and the name of the house are set on the front page in old English instead of some clear face. Apart from that and a cut the bill is good, being done in brown ink on pale green paper outside and blue ink on the inside. The cut for the Biograph feature was evidently intended for newspaper work. The screen is far too coarse to be used on a surfaced paper. It would have been better had the cut been discarded. A poor cut is worse than no cut at all and a 60 screen on a half tone paper does not belong. We would rather have good clean type work than cuts that have to be held at arm's length to show even half way decent.

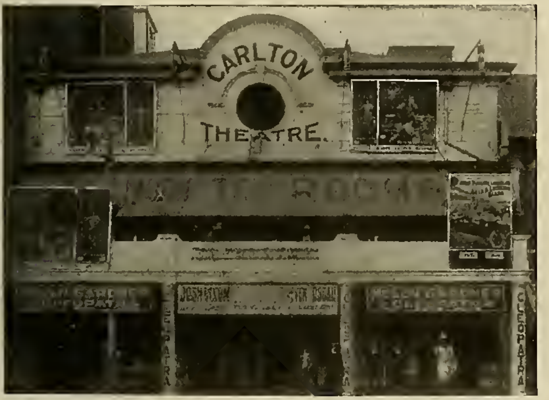
Possibly envious of Bert Williams' "motofilmic" Mr. Pulitzer goes into the word coining business and speaks of "vampirical" women. Gosh!

Another Coined Word.

We have nothing on our English cousins. We are in receipt of a Kinetradogram, published by the Kinetograph Trading Company, Ltd., of London. We'll get jealous one of these days and make some new language ourself.

From Jo'burg.

This picture doesn't look very different from others that have been used in this paper, but it is a photograph of the Carlton Theater, Johannesburg, South Africa, diked up for the Cleopatra pictures. Mr. L. H. Bloomfield, the manager, adds "I would be grateful if you would, through the medium of your valuable journal, get me into touch with the trade generally and more especially as to any novelties, etc., that may be given in advertising matter."



The request is passed along to the trade. We take it that Mr. Bloomfield must be coaxed with real novelties since it would not pay to import standard stuff.

Speaking of Novelties.

Speaking of novelties reminds us that the Kraus Manufacturing Company has issued a new series of licensed stars. Most exhibitors are familiar with their enamelled brown cards, but these are something much more artistic. The cards, which are 10½ by 14 inches, are done in a geletine-photographic process that gives virtually a photograph printed with ink instead of sunlight and nitrate of silver. It is not a half tone process but suggests rather a toned bromide photograph. They cost but little more than the browns, but are vastly more artistic. There are eleven in the set at present. We do not know of anything better for permanent lobby display, for the inside of the house or for a cumulative souvenir for a certain number of coupons. This is not an advertisement, it is a tip.

No. 2 Better.

We said that Bertram Williams would do better with his second issue of the Airdomeite, and he made good for us. Only two pages carry much rule and border ornamentation and these are so well done that we have to excuse him, while he runs two pages of text matter that really is bright. We think that he will expand as he goes along, but the second issue is plenty good enough. He starts off with a fable and turns to fact with this paragraph:

> A week ago Saturday night we had over a billion visitors at the Airdome. They were mostly composed of little fine bugs, intermixed with square green bugs and flying grasshoppers. There are only about three nights in the summer season when Ponca City is infested with these pests, and we've already had one of them. It's a cinch that we did our share in getting rid of them, for "Lucky" had a good half bushel scattered about his operating room, where they had been attracted by the brilliant light from the motion picture arc lamp.

Sunday evenings the airdome is turned over to a local minister for religious services. What's the matter with a series of "Union Services" so popular in the smaller towns if public sentiment will not let you run pictures Sunday? It's worth thinking about, and most of the ministers would be glad of three out of four Sundays off during the hot weather. To help along, get some religious pictures and run these without charge. Perhaps you can keep it up through the winter.

A Swatting Club.

Charles F. Kear, manager of the Minersville (Pa.) Opera House, has worked up a new angle for the swat the fly pictures. He ran the film for two nights, after getting a lot of press work in the papers and widely circulating a dodger declaiming against the fly and its 'orrid 'abits, he announced the formation of a Swat the Fly Club at the performance. Each child was given a card of membership, which is roughly reproduced below as to text. It is self explanatory.

MEMBERSHIP CARD TO THE MINERSVILLE

"Swat the Fly Club"

....REGULATIONS....

Five Dollars in Gold will be given to the boy or girl who delivers at the box office on or before August 1st, 1913, the greatest number of flies:—Every contestant must seal all flies captured, in a paper bag with his or her name written thereon not later than July 31st:—The winner will be announced from the stage on Friday evening, August 1st.

Membership Card Must be Shown at Box Office When Package is Left.

Get Busy. Help Rid the Town of the Fly Menace and Win Five Dollars in Gold.

CHAS. F. KEAR, Mgr. OPERA HOUSE.

Swat the Fly crusades should be started in May or June, when the first of the insect pests begin to breed. Put this on ice until next summer. Don't put it away so carefully that you cannot find it again, either. Put it where you know it can be found. Here's an advertising scheme that can run for from one to four months, but if run longer than a month it would be best to offer a monthly prize. It is always a good plan, too, to offer a few consolation prizes in the shape of a varying number of tickets.

On the Right Line.

George C. Cacum, of Clarksdale, Miss., is not one of those who cuts his program down because it is summer. Here is a recent reading notice:

> Mr. Cacum, Prop. and Mgr., of Cacum's Airdome, has had so many people inquiring as to whether he would cut down his show. or keep it up to the standard.
> Mr. Cacum wishes to say that the idea has never entered his mind, and furthermore he has made a contract for still better service at a higher figure.
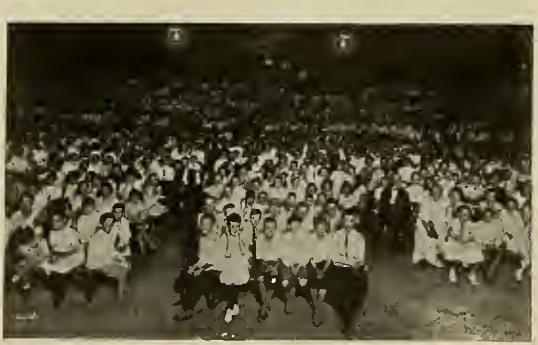
> Unlike the majority of managers, Mr. Cacum believes in the right way which, is to give the public just a little more than they pay for, whether there is competition or not, so the people of Clarksdale may rest assured that they will always have a first class show. as long as he remains in business.

And having read what Mr. Cacum has to say on the subject, here seems to be the answer:



Mr. Cacum writes that the photographer could not get all of the crowd within the angle of his lens and that about three hundred were left out, the actual paid attendance on that evening being 1,609. The preponderance of the kiddies is due to the fact that they have their own seats down front, close to the flash lamp. It is not a very good bit of photography, but the advertisement and photograph together supply an excellent object lesson.

Catch Lines.

Mr. Cacum has these photographs all over town, wherever a photograph may be lodged, with some catchline. He quotes a few:

> If you are looking for someone after eight o'clock go to Cacum's Airdome.
> Are you lonesome? Go to Cacum's Airdome. That's where the crowd went.
> An every night attendance at Cacum's Airdome. Just follow the crowd.

Mr. Cacum has lost his opposition, but that doesn't seem to him to be any reason for cutting down his performance. On the contrary, he betters it to make it a little harder still for the next opposition. That's the best way to fight opposition. Keep your show so good that when opposition comes no one will believe that the other show can possibly be as good as yours.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by Epes Winthrop Sargent

Still Ambling Along.

BECAUSE of the extra typesetting required by the convention number the composition work on the new Technique has been delayed, but the type has now been all set and it should not be more than four or five weeks before copies are ready for distribution. It is not yet possible to set an actual date, but it will not be long and the book will be worth waiting for.

Don't Stop.

Just because the weather is warm do not regard it as a sign to stop writing. Keep on and plug all the harder because it is hot and you do not feel like work. Even if your plays do not show the usual lift and spirit, keep on writing and, in the course of time, you'll get the trick of writing in all sorts of weather and at the same time you'll have a fine bunch of scripts to work over. Did you ever make the discovery that the story you cannot possibly make into a good one now will run much better six months from now. Don't try to keep shop with three or four scripts. Build up your string into a hundred and when one becomes shopworn put it down in the cellar and after a while fix it up and put it back on the shelf. This particularly applies to those who cannot, at the moment revise their scripts. Let them gather the dust until you have forgotten them and then take them out and do them over.

Song Publishing.

The other day the Post Office Inspectors gathered in a man who has been publishing songs for those foolish enough to pay him for printing a few shoddy copies, mostly from stereotype plates, but there are a lot left and if you have a song that someone tells you will make a great hit, don't pay them to print it. If it will make a great hit they will be glad to print it for you. If it will not sell, why try to get it done? This does not properly belong in this department, but many who try for photoplay also write song lyrics. If you are one of those save your money.

The Open Market.

Not many playwriters realize that the open market is very close at hand, and fewer still appreciate the influence this will have on the demand for photoplays. It is not probable that many more plays will be demanded; indeed there may be a slight drop in the number for a time, but the wholesale script factory maintained by the Universal, the narrow market of the Mutual and to some extent the purchases of the Licensed manufacturers will be changed.

The open market virtually means the abolition of the standing orders for release. It means that if a play is good it will sell and if it is not good it will not sell, but will be passed over in favor of something better. This means that a good script will be demanded and in turn this demand will result in a broadening of the market. No man or group of men can give a full program of proper diversity and to work along these lines is a mistake. The mistake is not yet fully realized because the fixed release date and the standing order is still in existence, but it does show in the quality of the plays and when the open market comes the man who at present writes practically all the scripts for one concern will become really an editor and select the work of others in preference to his own.

We know one man who has written the bulk of the plays for a certain Independent company ever since its inception. Good and bad alike must be used because he wrote them. In the new scheme he will write an occasional play, but he will not write a hundred or a hundred and fifty a year. Script factories, whether run by an individual or by a gang of writers, will be things of the past. Already many producers are complaining that they cannot obtain what they want from the factory. One producer the other day declared that of nearly a hundred scripts shown him not a single one was what he needed to suit the peculiar requirements of the company he directed. Another complained that no scripts were sent that could be used, and so it goes all along the line.

We must come to the point where the story is regarded as a story from the literary and not the price point of view. By that we do not mean the literary quality of the script but the quality of the story itself. The great handicap to pictures at the moment is the entrusting to one man the selection of plots for perhaps twenty or thirty productions a week. There is no variety to the product because it is all done from the personal point of view of this one man—and it does not always happen that this man is the most competent judge. It looks as though much better days were coming.

Two Men.

Lately we have had an unusual opportunity to observe the progress of two men who wanted to get ahead with photoplays. Both had been writing about the same length of time and both started on a certain definite campaign about the same time.

One of them spent about half of his time chasing a pull. He had been selling to a couple of companies pretty regularly, but in his effort to get in with other companies, he switched his style to suit each new editor with whom he came in contact. His work lost individuality and he hurried his script through because he was too busy going around to give proper time to his work.

He has an excellent acquaintance with editors and ex-editors, but his selling slips for May and June are not encouraging.

The other man started out to write good scripts. When he was asked to write stories of a certain phase of action, he went to the library and got a couple of books on the subject. He studied these and mastered them. Then he wrote his stories and the editor could appreciate the fact that he had studied because this fact was apparent in his scripts. In three months he had opened two profitable markets because he sought to write what these two studio editors wanted. Figure the moral to suit yourself, but it looks to us as though the real pull came with good work and not with acquaintance.

The Checked Rejection.

Several times lately we have printed letters from authors who complain that the checked rejection slip has been abolished by certain editors. We have explained that it is no part of the editor's business to instruct the photoplaywright and have added that these checked slips are more often a nuisance than a help since the value of the slip depends wholly upon the intelligence of the person making the checks. We are more in sympathy with this plaint from an author:

> It is not often that I lift my voice in protest against the methods of some of the film companies, because I find usually, that it is better to remain silent, and take what they hand you, and pray that none of them expire from enlargement of the heart—However, with the usual prospect of getting in decidedly wrong, I do wish to protest against the "marked beforehand," rejection slip.
> I am given to understand on good authority, that in one studio this practice is resorted to continuously, and from my own experience with this company, I cannot but believe. Out of 21 scenarios submitted in a period covering five months, 20 were returned marked "Idea has been done before"—One marked "Too Conventional"—Now before the editor of this page has a chance to remark that the said scenario editor knew what he was talking about, or that my submissions must have been very "rotten"—allow me to state that out of those 21 stories, 12 have sold since at good prices, and 4 are under consideration at present time. Now comes a Western company, to whom I sold two of those rejected by the first named company for reasons stated, and they have fallen into line with the "marked beforehand" slip. The last seven submissions have been returned with the same old moth-eaten excuse, the pencil mark on the slips nearly obliterated by daily handling. One must arrive at one of two conclusions by this marking: first, that some editors are so careless or disinterested in their work, that they are willing to accept stories, that have been done before, or second, we are led to believe that the editors in question are blithering idiots. We are all praying for success, and criticism is the keynote of success in the writing game, but does it stand to reason that any writer who is striving doggedly for that success, would willfully, negligently or otherwise deliberately use an idea that had been done before?
> You know what the ordinary rejection slip looks like, I have one before me with 17 reasons to be checked off why the scenario is returned, why, in the name of common decency, cannot they spare the tortured mind of the Will Be writer, and mark their old slip, not original, or not interesting, improbable, instead of attempting to force the writer into the belief, that he is a literary thief. If a rejection slip is to carry out the idea for which it is intended, let them mark it intelligently, or else go back to the form used by many companies, where no reason is given, this at least gives you three guesses, as to why, inspires you to send it out again until it either sells or reaches the "Pickling Vat."

We very strongly question the statement that the slips are checked beforehand, though the writer seems to prove at least the point that the editor complained of, lacks variety in his reasons, but we do believe that a number of the editors still using these slips check them indiscriminately and without real reason.

Just what "similar theme used before" means is more or less open to argument. Recently a story was sent a certain editor and returned with the remark that the company had produced one like it about a year before. And the ivory domed editorial person was unable to comprehend that it was precisely because the company had made one story along those lines that the second had been sent in. The central idea in both was about the same but the line up and incident were wholly different; vastly more different than three other stories released by the same company within two months. A person like that is not an editor at all nor even the possessor of average intelligence and a rejection slip checked by such an "authority" is misleading and worse than useless. We have never contended that all editors are persons of exceptional intelligence. Some are utterly incompetent and that is why we do not favor the checked rejection slip.

If any company does use its rejection slips with the slips already checked the practice should be stopped, but meantime writers will quickly learn those who can give the useful hints. The others they will ignore.

A Reward of Merit.

William H. Kitchell, who has been keeping uncommonly quiet of late, has compromised between his conscience and his love for baseball. When he has written a script he goes to a game and when he writes an unusually good one he goes to two games. The only trouble with this scheme is that it is apt to warp his judgment. When he wants to see two games and has no idea he decides that the last script is better than he thought it was at first, though why anyone should care to see Newark get licked by Jersey City again when we are playing real ball here in New York, is a mystery.

Doing You Best.

Do you always give the best that is in you to your work or do you tell yourself that you will write the $100 story when they give you $100 for a script?

We were surprised the other day to have one of the best known writers argue that an editor should not expect a properly developed script for $50, but that he should expect to pay $100 for hundred dollar work and not get it for $50.

When the argument was threshed out it amounted to this. Like all men who write for a living, this author hates the mechanical work of typing. He will spend eight or ten hours on the mental preparation of the script, but when he sits at the machine for the drudgery of getting the idea down on paper, he grudges every word he writes and his one idea is to get away from the desk the first possible moment.

As a result, his work is slipshod and undeveloped. His mental development of the idea is lucid and perfect, but he is too lazy to sit down to the machine and grind out the stint of words that will convey the idea to the director. His scenes run a line or two, his leaders are but half suggested and utterly unpolished and he turns from the machine with but half the idea on paper and offers that for half the price he thinks he should be paid.

We have a fellow feeling for any man who is chained to a typewriting machine. If there are typewriters in Heaven, we want to go to the other place and shovel coal instead of writing half reel comedies for the Angels, but since the use of a machine is part of our work, we conquer our aversion and do not begrudge the time that it takes to get the idea down on paper in full.

We aim at condensation not to save time but to make for lucid brevity and condensation does not mean the fewest possible number of words, but the fewest possible number of words that will adequately convey the full idea to the man who will make the story.

If we knew that we were to be paid but $10 each for ten scripts and had accepted that price, we should do our best to make each of those ten scripts as good in every way as anything we had ever done. We would not scamp the work because it was only a ten dollar job, we would not leave half the work undone for the editor or director to fill in. We would be just as careful, just as eager to please as though we were to be paid $100 for each of the ten instead of for all ten for the sake of our own credit and in the hope that the excellence of the work would lead to further orders at a better price.

If a script is worth doing at all it is worth while doing in the best you can without regard to the payment that will be made. The man who is going to write the hundred dollar script when they pay $100 for scripts is never going to work up to the hundred dollar mark because no one will give him the chance. If he cannot do a good job for $10 he cannot for $100. Ability is not a matter of price, it is a matter of accomplishment. You would be foolish to sell hundred dollar scripts for $10, but you would be still more foolish to write a ten dollar grade of script until someone coaxed you with an additional $90.

Do the best that's in you every time, no matter how hard the task and in time you will be advanced, but first it is necessary to prove that you deserve advancement.

Agrees With Hennessy.

This is from S. Walter Bunting, of Philadelphia, who agrees with George Hennessy that there is no money in a school theme if you try to play fair. Mr. Bunting was drawn into that Philadelphia "association" founded by Wright. He went over to the Literary Bureau, but found conditions there no more pleasant and started a school of his own. Mr. Bunting says:

> I noted with interest Mr. Hennessy's "Never Again" in your recent issue. I had much the same experience. The real ones, as a rule, do not want instruction and the others are a waste of time. I never made a bid for the business. Since the Literary Bureau failed, I have had several inquiries, three of which I answered and one of which I landed. He is almost through and when I have finished my contract with him it will be the last. Anyway, writing pays better unless you wish to hold out golden inducements which do not exist and also writing is more congenial work, for me, at least.

Mr. Bunting adds that he is developing into two and three reel stories some of his one reel scripts that were not passed because the ideas were too complex to be clearly handled in one reel form. Some of the old-timers might find it profitable to dig into their morgues for this sort of stuff.

Don't Make It Final.

Do not accept as final the judgment of the first studio to pass on a script. Here's the history of the sale of a comedy. The author writes:

> I first sent that script to the ————, and it was promptly and hurriedly returned with these objections checked:
> Too improbable.
> Lacks real comedy.
> Plot too slight.
> And then they added in lead pencil "would offend many Irish-Americans and few society ladies entertain washerwoman in their homes." If there was anything else wrong with the script they failed to mention it, but that was enough to hurt my feelings, because I had doped out the fact that it was a good, little story. However, I decided to send it out just once more "for luck," and my faith was promptly justified with a check for $20. Then last night I received a check for $25 from ———— for a story that had been rejected by twelve other companies.

And the funny thing about the last script was that it sold to a company that from the general style of production would seem to be about the last one to purchase the story. If you have faith in your story and do not think that you can get it into better shape, give all the companies a chance. If a company changes editors meantime, give them two chances.

Another Reason for Carbons.

Recently an editor complained that he could not seem to help a certain woman writer. She had promising ideas and in an effort to guide her to proper technique, he sent her the scripts from which her stories were actually made. He felt that by studying these and comparing them with her originals she would see wherein her handling and technical treatment of the plot had failed, but it seemed to be useless.

Having more time than the editor, we wrote the author that if she would bring over the scripts both of the original and the reconstruction we would go over them with her and show her how to study the changes. To our surprise—for she is a clever writer of short stories, as well as plays—she replied that she had no carbons of her original work but that when she had an idea she went to the machine, wrote it and shipped it off.

This seems almost unbelievable, but it explains her lack of progress. She has no carbons and probably but a hazy recollection of what she wrote. If she sees the produced script she may wonder that it came out so nicely, but she cannot discover her mistakes by the simple process of comparing her script with the perfect technical development of the studio.

Carbon paper is so cheap and its use is so extremely simple that there is no excuse for any author not retaining a copy of his work, not alone that he may compare it with produced work but that he may have a copy in case the original is lost or otherwise destroyed.

Get carbons that suit your paper and use them under every sheet of script that you intend to send out. If you use a soft surface paper get soft carbon, and hard carbon for hard paper, that you may get the best possible results.

LUBIN WANTS 'EM.

If you can write strong, virile two-reel scripts. They do not want merely two thousand feet of action. They want an idea that is worth two or three thousand feet of film. They'll supply the technique, if necessary, but they need the ideas. They will naturally pay more for the fully developed practical script, but they will pay generously for ideas not so perfectly developed, and "generously," with the Lubin Company, does not mean five or ten dollars.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE.

C. R.—Your question is too obscurely put to enable an intelligent reply. You simply take your incident and build a story around it. Plot evolution is very completely treated in the new edition of "Technique of the Photoplay," which will be out in about six or eight weeks. The process is too involved to be treated here. Simply build up.

W. R. B.—Miss Turner is in England playing. Mr. Booth appears to have dropped out of pictures. He played The Snapper Kid in "The Musketeers of Pig Alley." His given name is Elmer. There is a gradual tendency to break down the lines and it is not now unusual to find independent features on the same bill with licensed service. This is largely due to the fact that the licensed manufacturers release but three features a week. Later on there will be six or more multiple reels a week. The "Photoplay Magazine" has just been revived in the interests of the Universal Company.

E. E. N.—The person who talks about "unnecessary work" is never going to make a hit as a writer. If you offer a photoplay for sale offer a photoplay, and not merely a synopsis. Editors have no time to correspond with you about the matter, and cannot tell from the synopsis what sort of action you can write. If you are not willing to write and submit the plot in action, stick to Keystone comedies, which may be submitted in synopsis form, but if you are inclined to worry about too much work, you had better quit right now.

EDWARD—This paper will publish, in a few weeks, a new edition of "Technique of the Photoplay," which will give you all necessary information. Wait for it.

COLUMBUS—We have no list of states having local censorships, but about half the states have cities with local censorships more or less effective.

G. G.—William Mason was Phil March in "Phil March's Engagement."

L. V.—Marc Edmund Jones writes that he was the secret service man in "The Prophecy." Frank Dayton was the sheriff. The secret service man was not cast, as Mr. Jones is not a regular actor, but a photoplaywright. And if this comes under the observation of Jones, will he please give an address for the benefit of several New York friends. Chicago is not regarded as a sufficient address.

W. A. W.—Biograph made "Silas Marner," making him a shoemaker instead of a weaver, and Edison did the story with proper adherence to the story. We do not recall that "Little Lord Fauntleroy" has been done in photoplay. If any manufacturer wants to make it he will prefer to deal with the holder of the copyright, and not with you. You do not have to arrange with anyone for the rights to George Eliot's works, but you'll find it not easy to dispose of arrangements. They do these more intelligently in the studio. By "intelligently," we mean that the studio writer knows just how his particular company wants a story treated. You cannot sell technique. You must offer ideas, and your own ideas. In making arrangements from copyrighted works, it is necessary to arrange with the holder of the copyright, whether that be the author or publisher.

MRS. L. E. B.—"The Photoplay Author" is not the "Photoplay Magazine." It is published at Holyoke, Mass. The Boonville aggregation is apparently dead and buried. Monte Katterjohn is selling scripts.

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

The Importance of Lining the Optical System.

IN the past, altogether too little importance has been attached to the proper alignment of the optical system of the projector, both by the operator and by the manufacturer of projection machines. As a matter of fact, practically none of the manufacturers have given this exceedingly important item much consideration, particularly as regards squaring the various lenses of the projector with one another.

The optical system of a projector ordinarily consists of six lenses, viz.: two condensing lenses, two lenses in the rear of the objective lens, and two in the front of the objective, the latter two usually being cemented together so that they form, to all intents and purposes, one lens. Attention has been repeatedly called, both in this Department and in the Handbook, to the importance of having the axis of the optical system in line throughout. Directions for accomplishing this have been given in the Department and are set forth fully on pages 227 and 228 of the Handbook.

However, even though the lenses be lined perfectly with each other, so far as their mechanical and optical center or axis is concerned, still it will readily be seen that the desired result has not been attained if the lenses set, in relation to each other, as shown in sketch A (Handbook), in which X is a line representing the optical axis of the mechanical center of the lenses. This sketch requires no argument. If the lenses set thus in relation to each other, they are not lined optically. Now, the squaring of the lenses with each other is a matter which should be very carefully attended to by the manufacturers of projecting machines, but there is no manufacturer at the present time who gives sufficient attention to this important detail. The lamphouse mount is more or less carefully made, due to the fact that the construction must be kept down in cost, since the exhibitor demands cheapness. As a matter of fact, the condenser mount should be carefully and accurately made and mounted so that each lens will set precisely square with the other, and the whole, mechanically and optically, in line with the aperture and the objective lens of the projector.

This squaring of the lenses with each other is a thing that must be attended to by the manufacturer himself. It is difficult, if not an impossibility, for the operator to accomplish it, and I am thoroughly convinced that much of the ghost trouble and other light imperfections are due to faults in the lining and squaring of the optical system.

As has before been pointed out by the writer, the projector is too cheap in price. It is an impossibility for the manufacturer to give these details the attention necessary in order to perfect them, and do it at a price enabling him to sell the machine at present figures. As a matter of fact, the projection machine ought to sell for $500. It would be a splendid thing to the exhibitor himself if such a machine were placed on the market. At this figure, the utmost care could be given all these various details and the machine could be made, as near as anything can be made, optically and mechanically perfect. I hope and sincerely trust that the time is not far distant when such a projector will be a reality. The price of projectors is rapidly advancing and the quality is advancing along with the price, which is but right and natural. Compare one of the modern projectors which sells, complete, for say $275, with the old machines that sold for $200 or a little more or less. Note the vast improvement that has been accomplished, merely by comparatively slight raise in price. But there still remains much to be done and it cannot be done at present figures. The exhibitor is, however, awakening to the importance of excellence in his projection machinery, and I think it will not be long when he will not only be willing, but glad, to pay even as much as $500 for a projection machine which will put perfect results on his screen and will outlast two of the present machines. In the last item, he will make up for the added expenditure and gain something besides.

The High-Priced Machine.

In conversation with a machine manufacturer who is contemplating the introduction of a new model of projector in the near future, I suggested to him the making of two grades of the new machine; one to sell in competition with present projectors, the other to sell for between four and five hundred dollars, preferably the latter sum. The idea was not received with any large degree of enthusiasm, though it was not entirely rejected, either. My view of this matter, as I have said before in these columns, is that it is utterly impossible for the manufacturer to put out the best possible projection machine for the price now prevailing. The thing simply cannot be done. There must be skimping somewhere.

I believe there are, at the present time, a limited number of moving picture theater managers who would be willing to pay a very substantial advance in price for a projection machine which would be mechanically and optically as nearly perfect as it is possible to make such a machine. A machine listing at four hundred and fifty to five hundred dollars could be built throughout of the very best material obtainable and be made to all intents and purposes, mechanically perfect. Its optical system could be built up of high-class lenses, thoroughly and completely lined and squared with each other, and with the aperture. Many improvements could be added, and I am sure that such a machine would, in the long run, be well worth the advanced price demanded.

The field for its sale, would, however, at the present time, be a limited one, but it would grow and, I think, that within five years from now, such a mechanism would very largely replace the cheaper make of projector. In fact, within the comparatively near future I expect to see a five hundred dollar projector on the market, and I also expect to see them come into general use. In this connection, let me say that I have been astonished at the way the business of manufacturing of moving picture projectors has kept up. It is nothing short of amazing where all these machines go. The Simplex factory is running to capacity and I understand the Motiograph is doing an excellent and perhaps a capacity business. The Nicholas Power Company has put out more than 10,000 No. 6 and 6A machines in about three year's time, and their factory is now run to its capacity. As to the Edison, I have not heard recently what they are doing, but I suppose they are getting their share of the business and the American Moving Picture Machine Company is putting out quite a lot of outfits. Aside from this, the Kinemacolor people are supplying their own machines, and there are a few other manufacturers who are putting out a number of projectors.

In view of all this, one naturally wonders what becomes of all these machines. Particularly is this the fact when one considers that there are today thousands of the old Power's No. 4 and No. 5 mechanisms, the Edison Exhibition Model mechanisms, and the earlier types of the Motiograph in use, some of them having seen service for as long as five to six years, and some even longer than that. Of course, the field is still developing. The United States Government is putting projectors on its battleships and using them for other purposes. Schools and colleges are adding projectors, and churches are doing the same thing. City departments are purchasing moving picture machines to be used by the various departments for various purposes. So that one is inclined to smile at the skeptic who still has the nerve to voice his belief in the transitory nature of the moving picture.

Four years ago, I said that the moving picture was still in its infancy. It has not outgrown its knickerbockers yet and I am beginning to think that it will not begin to go into its long pants for the next five years. Even manufacturing companies, railroads and steamboat lines are putting in moving picture machines to advertise their business. Just a few weeks ago Mr. J. C. Hemment was called upon by one of the trans-Atlantic steamship companies to take a series of films, showing the docking of one of the great liners in New York Harbor and, by the way, he got a magnificent film, too—a habit friend Jack has. In one of the scenes he shows sixteen tugs pulling at one steamship, and believe me, it is some sight.

Where will the end be? I do not know and neither does anyone else. It is a lead pipe cinch that the permanency of the moving picture is sufficiently well established and insured to justify the placing on the market of the very best projector that mechanical and optical ingenuity can devise.

From New Orleans.

Mr. Harry H. Finney, New Orleans, writes:

> In the issue of June 7th, you suggest that some one describe conditions in New Orleans. Well, I am not an operator, though I hope to be some day, but I read the projection department every week and will at least try to comply with your requests. On the whole, projection in this city is good. I visit most of the shows on Canal Street every day of my vacation, and only one out of the ten has poor projection. But in that one it is about as bad as it can be, though they show a Mutual program about six days old. This is my first trial, so do not blame me if it is not quite what it should be. I hope some one else will follow up and do our city justice. Also, may I try again some time?

You certainly may Friend Finney. It is a cinch you did not waste words anyhow. I am well acquainted with your city, having compiled a very complete guide to New Orleans several years ago. I can assure the New Orleans boys that we shall be pleased to hear from them at any time and if they cannot find the stub of a lead pencil we will cheerfully send one.

A Mistake.

There is one machine manufacturer whom I believe is making a serious error in that nothing about the outfit is standard. Every screw, rod and everything else is, as far as possible, odd size. The idea of the manufacturer is to protect himself against the use of inferior parts, but, while I sympathize with him and cannot blame him for trying to protect himself, still I think he does not quite realize what an infernal nuisance this is to the operator and manager. If they happen to break a screw, instead of being able to use a standard machine screw, secured from any hardware store, they must either wait until one is received from the factory, seldom or never a practical thing to do, else they must tap out the hole and make standard threads therein, or else force a screw in that does not fit. We all know that the use of spurious parts put out by manufacturers who are only interested in selling the part, and care nothing whatever for the reputation of the machine as a whole, is a genuine thorn in the side of machine manufacturers. But this manufacturer, in endeavoring to protect himself against this, is working a decided injustice against purchasers of his machine, and two wrongs do not make a right.

After Our Nanny.

Philadelphia sends in another cross-examination. Evidently the gentleman from the City of Brotherly Love has his lasso out and is after our William Goat with blood in his eye. However, since we received this second bunch of questions, we rented a room under the flag pole of the Woolworth Tower and have carried our goat up there and locked him carefully in. Here is the second bunch:

> (1) What is meant by an inductive type of rheostat? (2) When the carbons are closed, as when striking an arc, are the fuses and rheostat overloaded, or does the current only flow when the carbons are separated? (3) Can a projection arc lamp be connected to a series-arc system, if the voltage thereof be no greater than 220; for instance, outside of many motion picture theaters are two or more arc lamps connected in series. Can a projection arc lamp be connected in such series if wire fuses, etc., are large enough? (4) Is it practical to use 100 amperes of 110 volt current on a projection arc lamp? Could four 110 volt, 25 ampere rheostats be connected in multiple to get 100 amperes? If so, what would the voltage at the arc be? For instance, 110 volts through a 110 volt, 25 ampere rheostat, gives 25 amperes at 48 volts at the arc, which shows that the rheostat itself consumes 62 volts. Now how is this voltage drop at the arc figured in the multiple arrangement of resistance? (5) If a rheostat has a coil touching the casing (grounded as it is called), and the rheostat set on metal which had a connection with the earth, would I get a light at the lamp? (6) In case the insulation is defective in one or more coils of the rheostat, how can a test be made to find which coil has defective insulation? (7) If three fuses were to be put in cutout of Hallberg's Economizer, as the illustration on page 159 of the Handbook shows, what would be the result? (8) What is the difference between a transformer made for 25 cycles and one made for 60 cycles? (9) If I had a rheostat supplying 25 amperes to the arc when working on 110 volt pressure, but the capacity of the rheostat were 50 amperes, could I connect it to 220 volt lines and get 50 amperes on the arc? Would the higher amperage at the arc decrease the resistance, and would the carbons be farther apart, or in other words would I carry a longer arc than when using 25 amperes? (10) Does the law require the connection for the motor of motor-driven machines to be made to a circuit independent of the projection arc lamp circuit, or may it be connected to the switch under the machine baseboard? (11) Could two 220 volt Fort Wayne compensarcs be connected in multiple on 110 volts, and deliver the same voltage and amperes at the arc as would one 110 volt machine when working at 110 volt pressure? (12) Can choke coils be connected in multiple? Please do not publish my name.

Huh! I should not think that you would want your name published after handing me that bundle. Shame on you, man. Well, here goes. (1) properly speaking, there is no such a thing as an "inductive rheostat." Miles Bros. put out what they called an inductive rheostat, but it is no longer made. Such devices are in reality a type of choke coil. (2) When the carbons are brought together the resistance of the arc is eliminated, and this, of course, throws a heavier load on the rheostat. You will find this matter explained on page 48 of the Handbook. With 110 volt current and a 25 ampere rheostat the difference in amperage would be the difference between 110 divided by 4⅖, when the arc is burning with an arc voltage of 48, and 110 divided by approximately 2 when the carbons are frozen. That is the way it figures, but in practice the amperage would not increase so much as indicated, by reason of the fact that the heavier load on the resistance wires would instantly raise their temperature and increase their resistance, so that the figures really only represent the theory of the thing. (3) The circuit described is not a "series-arc system." In a series-arc system the voltage increases arbitrarily 50 volts to each added lamp in the circuit. No, you cannot connect into a series of lamps such as is described, for several reasons, one of which is the fact that the projection arc has a very variable resistance and this would effect the other lamps. Another one is that you would not get amperage enough. (4) Yes, and I understand that it is common practice in Australia to do so. Four 25 ampere 110 rheostats connected in multiple would give you 100 amperes all right, provided they delivered up to their rated capacity. Yes, they would "control things" all right. I do not know just what the voltage at the arc would be. You would probably have to use one inch carbons, or ⅞ inch at least. The arc stream (gases from the volatilized carbon) would be very heavy and would effect the resistance of the arc. Due to this factor I cannot tell you how to figure the actual resistance of the arc at various amperages. (5) You would get light unless the ground was strong enough to blow your fuses, but the ground would affect the light in more ways than one. Notably, it would rob the arc of some of its amperage. (6) There is no practical method that I know of for doing this. The only way I can suggest would be the testing of the voltage drop across each coil, using a very sensitive voltmeter, when the rheostat is operating at capacity, or, better still, when it is somewhat overloaded by freezing the carbons. (7) Only one fuse must be used. If more than one is used it would have the effect of forming a local short circuit in the primary coil, which would instantly blow one or both of the fuses. (8) A 25 cycle transformer must have approximately 100 per cent. more iron in its core than one made for 60 cycles. In other words the higher the cycle the less iron is needed and vice-versa. (9) Yes. I have already covered the second question. Yes, the carbons would be further apart with a 50 ampere arc. (10) such things are governed by local laws, therefore no general answer can be given. (11) Yes, though I do not think the amperage resulting from the multiple connection would be quite the same as it would be with one 110 volt transformer working at 110. (12) Yes.

In regards to highly technical questions; there are men who have made a life study and a specialty of electricity alone, who can run rings around me in that particular profession. There are professional machinists, opticians, chemists, engineers, inventors, orators and writers, each of whom could make me look like thirty cents if it came to a show-down in his own particular specialty. Now isn't it expecting a good deal to consider (as some do) that in my brief career I should have absorbed knowledge enough to be a professor of electricity, mechanics, optics, chemistry, engineering, physics, oratory and literature? I am a specialist myself. My specialty is Projection. Into that profession enter certain parts of other professions. The best that can be done, therefore, by a man in my position, is to learn only those parts of other professions which apply to projection, and let the rest go without any hope of ever soaring into the algebraic clouds that envelop the pinnacles of said professions. An expert writer on projection can be nothing more than a good all-around man.

A Little Trouble.

Ontario, Canada, wants help as follows:

> I am running a Power's "Six," which has been in constant use for a year and a half. There is considerable noise in the intermittent. The way I adjusted it is as follows: I set my small bushing with the oil hole matching the oil hole in the frame of the machine. I have tried other ways but this seems to give the best result. Then, loosening the set screw which holds the large bushing, I insert a small steel punch and, running machine meanwhile, turn the bushing back and forth until it is in the position where the machine runs most easily. If while running the machine I bear slightly on the sprocket teeth with my fingers it quiets the sound considerably, the same being true when the film is in, which would lead one to suspect worn bearings. This is not true, however, because I put in new bushing without it having any effect on the noise. It gets my goat, to think that a thing like this can get ahead of me, but, it has all right.

In the first place, Ontario, your letter was not signed, and unsigned letters very rarely receive attention. I do not publish names if you ask me not to, but all letters absolutely must be signed to receive attention. Now as to your trouble. In the first place you will find directions for adjusting intermittent movement of Power's "Six" machine under instruction No. 39, page 281, of the Handbook, a copy of which you should by all means have. Secondly, if that intermittent movement has been running a year and a half, it undoubtedly is badly worn. Suppose it only runs two hours a day, 365 days in the year. It acts 16 times each second, or 960 times a minute, or 57,600 times each hour or 115,200 times in two hours. Now if it runs two hours a day for a year it acts 42,048,000 times a year, or 63,072,000 times in a year and a half. What do you expect from steel and iron? You had better send that machine in and have a new intermittent movement put in. If you run it four hours a day then your intermittent movement has acted considerably more than a billion times already.

Salt Lake Is With Us.

Bob Worthen, Salt Lake City, Utah, writes:

> With regard to the I. A. T. S. E. locals co-operating with you in your most excellent scheme of propounding questions each week, you will certainly have this local with you, and anything we can do to make the scheme a huge success will be done gladly. Also would be glad to have any suggestions from you in regard to the same. I was waiting to see if any of our brothers were wide enough awake to grasp the fact that such a scheme would be of vast benefit to us, but, inasmuch as they were not I have taken the matter up myself, though I am not the secretary. I will put it before the local at our next regular meeting, June 16th, and we will no doubt follow the suggestion you gave to the Canadian local and hang up prizes. If you decide to attend the convention, kindly let us know the date you will arrive in Salt Lake City and we will do the rest.

I was quite sure Salt Lake would be with us, and was surprised that they did not get busy sooner. I will stop in Salt Lake City a few hours only, as my stops must be few and far between. I will notify friend Worthen of the time of my arrival, which will be on the return trip. In issue of July 5 will be found my itinerary, which is planned to consume the least possible time. I would like to visit every local on the way, but it is impossible. I have no suggestions to make, other than those already made to the Canadian local.

An Excellent Terminal.

Mr. H. E. Baumgartner, Osage, Iowa, sends in one of his new wire terminals for inspection. It is a simple little device, made of brass, or some metal which looks like brass. A hole through which the wire passes is about ¾ of an inch long, and something more than half of its circumference is lined with a U shaped bushing, which clamps the wire and acts upon it like a vise when the two set screws are turned down. Brother Baumgartner claims that the electrical connection will be so complete that no heat will be generated, and this is undoubtedly true. He also calls attention to the fact that, with the present tendency toward high amperage, there is great need for a perfectly tight contact, and in this he is also correct. I can recommend the device as thoroughly practical and efficient.

Young, Good Looking Operator.

Mr. Wm. Hallis, Atlantic City, New Jersey, arises to remark:—

> We are the proud possessors of a licensed lady operator, working in one of our new theaters. She is young, good-looking, and has been working at the business four years. It must be said that she is a good operator, but she does not belong to the union. There are four new picture theaters almost completed and business is fine.

Young and good-looking, eh! In New York the Johnnies used to wait at the stage door. I suppose in Atlantic City they now wait at the operating room door. Let us hear from you, young lady. Also get into the union and be a good union "man." There is no mistake this time, Cincinnati, the young lady is in Atlantic City, New Jersey, and while no bunches of grapes are mentioned, it seems that she is a peach. Huh!

New York Operators' License Fee.

For some time past, there has been complaint on the part of the New York Operators' Examining Board, and the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, that men who failed to pass the examination for operator's license, apply at the end of three months for re-examination and keep on applying, though they have gained practically nothing in added knowledge. Mr. Henry Thompson, Commissioner of the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, City of New York, has proposed to the Board of Aldermen, an ordinance calculated to discourage this practice. He proposes that a fee of $2.50 be imposed upon all applicants for examination, and that, if the examination be successful, another fee of $2.50 be exacted upon the issuance of certificate. He also seeks to impose a tax of $1.00 for all renewals of license. The Commissioner's letter to the Board of Aldermen, explaining the proposition, reads as follows:

> Gentlemen—I am enclosing a draft of proposed ordinance fixing a license fee to be exacted from all applicants for certificates to operate moving picture machines and for the payment of an additional sum upon qualifying in the examination and receiving a certificate of competency. In addition a fee of $1 shall be collected annually for each license renewed.
> This ordinance appears necessary by reason of the fact that at least two Examining Inspectors of the department are required to give their entire attention to the examination of applicants for licenses to operate moving picture machines. The results of these examinations clearly establish that a very small percentage of those applying for licenses are competent to operate moving picture machines with any degree of certainty in order to insure safety to those patronizing moving picture theaters.
> The department rule provides that upon the failure of a candidate to qualify he may not be re-examined for three months. Many who have failed present their application for re-examination at stated intervals of three months until they secure their certificate. The services of the Inspectors who are now continuously on duty examining candidates could be used to much better advantage in the interests of the City, and I believe that in demanding a license fee from these candidates they will not persist in filing applications for examination or re-examination until they are fully prepared to pass the test which the Department has prescribed and which the law demands each operator shall undergo before securing a license.
> Will you please submit this draft or ordinance to the honorable Board of Aldermen at its next meeting and urge its passage?
> Yours truly,
> Henry S. Thompson, Commissioner.

The proposed ordinance, which was referred to the Committee on Laws and Legislation, reads as follows:

> AN ORDINANCE to provide for examination and license fees for license to operate any moving picture apparatus and its connections in The City of New York.
> Be It Ordained by the Board of Aldermen of The City of New York, as follows:
> Section 1. Any person applying for a license to operate any moving picture apparatus and its connections in The City of New York shall, at the time of his application, pay to the officer authorized by law to examine the applicant and to issue the license, an examination fee of two dollars and fifty cents ($2.50), and if after such examination a license is granted him he shall pay in addition, upon the issue of such license, a license fee of two dollars and fifty cents ($2.50).
> Sec. 2. Every licensed operator of any moving picture apparatus and its connections in The City of New York shall pay an annual renewal fee of one dollar ($1) for each annual renewal of his license.
> Sec. 3. This ordinance shall take effect immediately.

At first, the editor of this department believed the proposed fee of $5.00 to be excessive, but he is assured by the Board of Examiners that they have figured the thing out closely, and it will but very little more than cover the actual cost to the city. This, however, might be questioned, in this way. If the re-examinations, of which the Department very justly complains, kept up at the present rate, the Board's claim might be true, but with a fee of $2.50 imposed for examination, there are not going to be anywhere near so many of them, and the expense to the Department will thus be largely reduced. Therefore, I think, with a $1.00 renewal fee, the proposed fee of $5.00 will be excessive, though possibly not unreasonably so.

It is a question, however, whatever the legal right may be, whether the city has the moral right to impose a fee for a license of this kind. We all abhor the idler, whether he be millionaire or tramp. The slogan of the world is work, and society demands that every man earn his daily bread. This being true, has society the right to turn around and prohibit a man from earning his daily bread, except he first pay a fee for the privilege of so doing? Nobody would seriously question the right of society, represented by the city or State government, to demand that the moving picture operator prove he is a safe man to be placed in charge of projection apparatus. But we can seriously question the right to compel the individual to pay for the process of producing this proof. Society wants something, viz: proof that the operator is competent. Well, society isn't any better than the individual, so long as he behaves himself (which society itself doesn't always do) and if I want a bushel of potatoes, or anything else, I've got to pay for it. It seems to me, therefore, that this being something that society wants, and the operator doesn't particularly want, it is up to society to foot the bill, or, at the very least, to charge only the exact cost of the service.

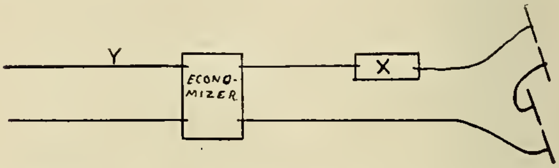
However, there is another angle to this thing which makes the matter of excessive charge uncertain, viz., there won't be very many $5.00 fees, though the crop of $2.50 ones will be large. Possibly with renewls, examination fees and license issuance fees, the whole thing might fall below the actual cost when you come to average it up, but this does not settle the question as to whether or not the operator ought to pay any fee at all.

A Problem.

Mr. W. E. Meyer, Los Angeles, California, writes:

> Pardon my interruption, but I cannot hold out any longer. I have a problem before me concerning which I want information. It is whether or not a rheostat and a compensarc can be used in series. The problem is: if I should cut out the neutral wire of a three-wire system, to which is connected two lamps, one taking current through a rheostat, and the other through a compensarc, could I use one or both lamps for projection purposes, using these same appliances? My own answer would be: connect the two leads of the neutral line and freeze the carbons of one of the lamps, which would throw the two resistance devices in series with each other. Could I do this and get good results?

I do not quite understand what you mean, friend Meyer, by "connecting the two leads of the neutral line and freezing the carbons of one lamp." If you were to connect a 110 volt compensarc on a 220 volt line, and wire as shown in the accompanying sketch, the thing would work, after a fashion, temporarily, provided there be sufficient resistance at Y to hold the amperage down. You could use one lamp by freezing the carbon of the other.



Incidentally, while we are discussing this matter who knows what evil effect there is, aside from the waste involved, in connecting resistance in series with the primary or secondary of a transformer? Also, who can tell us what the practical effect would be in the following: suppose I have a 110 volt economizer working on one side of a three wire system, and get orders to immediately connect to the outside wires which would, of course, mean 220 volts. I have nothing but the 110 volt economizer and a 110 volt 25 ampere rheostat. Now, supposing, I connect my rheostat into the line on the primary side, thus placing the resistance in series with the primary of the economizer. What would the net result be on the arc, and, aside from the waste, what would the objection be? If, on the other hand, I connected the rheostat into the line on the secondary side of the economizer, what would the result be? The question is an interesting one and involves quite a number of points; also it is a condition which an operator might be called upon to face at almost any time. When you all get through I will ask Mr. Hallberg, the pioneer in economizer manufacture, to tell us exactly what the correct answer is, as Mr. Hallberg is an expert and an authority in matters of this kind.

Wants a New Handbook.

Mr. L. H. Warner, Cheyenne, Wyoming, writes thusly:

> "Just a few lines from the wild and woolly west; but first please find enclosed money order for $2.50 for one of the new handbooks. I have been a "Knight of the Crank" ever since the days when the old "store" picture shows were few and far between. Think back with me to those good old days, and what we had to contend with. Who would have believed then that the film would ever run into a take-up, or that we could run two or three reels with one set of carbons, or pull our machines with electric motors? What an amazing improvement there has been in the moving picture game since then. Well do I remember when it kept us guessing as to where we would see the picture next, on the curtain, side walls or ceiling. Back here in Cheyenne we have four theatres. All run pictures, and the projection is good. The boys are all trying to outdo each other, but I have the advantage in the best equipment. My operating room is not so large, but it is right up to the standard. I enclose one of our theatre programs.

Yes, bother Warner, there has been an enormous improvement in the past few years. Some of that improvement is due directly, in one way or another, to the influence of this department. I am glad to know that projection is good in your City. I shall probably pass through Cheyenne on my way to the convention, but will not be able to stop off, much as I should like to. I note remarks on back of program calculated to reassure patrons as to fire danger, and that your wall shutters are "hung by a thin cord." Better hang them from a master cord arranged as per directions in handbook and then if you have a proper vent flue there will be no need to reassure the patron, for even should there be a fire he would know nothing about it until it was all over.

"A MILLINERY BOMB" (Vitagraph), July 9.—A laughable situation develops in this half reel, wherein John Bunny thinks his wife's new hat is a dynamite bomb and calls two big policemen in to help duck it in a tub full of water. The wife arrives just in time to pull her bedraggled and ruined bonnet out of the water. Good comedy.

"SOLITARIES" (Vitagraph), July 9.—Another very entertaining comedy. on same reel with above. The young man and girl, living in adjoining apartments, go out to buy an engagement ring for his friend. Mrs. Gossip spies them and starts a report that they are to be married. Later, of course, they decide this is the best way out of it. A good release.

"THE OUTER SHELL" (Essanay), July 9.—This picture follows along old lines, but is nicely handled and the story gets hold. The father, who will not let his daughter marry a poor man, goes back to his old home for a visit. Here fond memories return of his own early days, when his wife's father opposed him for the same reasons. His wife follows him back to the old home and there are some affecting scenes when they agree to the daughter's choice. The acting in this was very natural and pleasing throughout and the photography good.

"A HERO AMONG MEN" (Lubin), July 9.—A two reel offering, notable for its splendid spectacular fire effects and its unusually successful presentation of a factory strike. The story of the young hero was of a conventional order and there was never much doubt about what was going to happen. The second reel, however, gets up good suspense and holds it to the end. It was not shown very clearly how the girl came to know about the danger to the board of directors. The opening love scenes in the first reel were attractive. In this film, also, no apparent effort was made to put out the fire, and it seems absurd that the president should grant the increase of wages after the factory had burned. Entertaining, though not powerful.

"THE SCHOOL MA'AM" (Patheplay), July 9.—A story built around the situation of a young married woman teaching school to take care of her invalid husband. The school committee, not knowing of their marriage, decide to dismiss her. The school house takes fire, just as Black Pete has locked the teacher and children inside. The young husband comes to the rescue. His unexpected show of strength in this crisis, and also the fact that no attention was paid to the fire, were two weak features of the plot.

"HIS MOTHER-IN-LAW'S VISIT" (Edison), July 9.—A comedy of the quiet sort, by Mark Swan. The young wife is content to be neat and plain, till her mother comes and shows her how to look more attractive, much to the husband's delight. His friend Bill falls in love with the mother. Quite pleasing and well handled.

"THE REFORMATION OF DAD" (Selig), July 9.—Here is a very fair humorous conception, though rather drawn out. Dad is an old toper and in spite of the doctor's warning that he will soon begin to "see things" he refuses to quit. The son borrows an elephant, a camel, some monkeys and snakes from a visiting circus and gives the old man a scare which effects a speedy cure. The idea in this is amusing and entertaining.

"THE TREACHERY OF A SCAR" (Kalem), July 9.—In the opening scene the audience sees a burglar reflected in the looking glass, in the girl's room. This scene is well handled, but there was too much posing in the subsequent fire scene, when the burglar saves the girl. Many recent releases have made a fire a mere incident, with no effort shown to put it out, and no apparent attention to the gravity of the situation. This destroys all suspense, as it indicates that there is really no danger to anyone in the story. The later scenes, where the reformed burglar saves the bank from being robbed, were somewhat stronger.

"THE SPIRIT OF THE ORIENT" (Vitagraph), July 11.—Love story of a white man and an Oriental woman with a touch of Robert Hitchens' "Belladona" in the way it is developed. Egypt furnishes the backgrounds and the players are Maurice Costello and Clara Kimball Young in the leading romantic roles, supported by others of the Vitagraph travelers. It is an interesting picture, clearly photographed and makes a very fair offering; yet it cannot be called impressive.

"THE SIGN" (Essanay), July 11.—Called "a drama with a purpose," this picture gives, with a good deal of truth, a glimpse of what is even likely to happen to simple-minded foreigners in a strange land. It shows how Pietro's savings were jeopardized through his trusting a dishonest banker, also an Italian, and how his own simple Italian way of handling the matter rescued his little fortune. The moral is, perhaps, that when a man is unable to make use of the law, he will act in his own direct way. As an offering of entertainment, the picture has an interesting situation which it has clearly developed; but is a little weak on acting. E. H. Calvert, who plays Pietro, is not convincing in this particular role; he hasn't studied Italians enough, perhaps, for he is a competent actor. Dorothy Phillips, as his wife, and Frank Dayton, as the banker, are better. The photography is clear and the picture has much to commend.

"IN OLD DUTCH TIMES" (Edison), July 11.—There is a good deal of prettiness in this picture and the story, though not strong, is pleasingly fanciful. It is a sort of fairy story without the miraculous, and its heroine is a little girl of New Amsterdam, heiress to a great fortune in Holland, who has been kidnaped by a freebooter, claiming to be her father for the fortune's sake. She has been left in charge of a brutal innkeeper's wife and has a hard time, but makes friends and at length comes into her own. The especially noticeable figures in it are the benevolent-looking highwayman (Richard Neill), the heroine (Helen Coughlin), and Hans, the gooseherd (Bessie Learn). The script is by Richard Ridgely. The photography is only fair.

"PORCELAINS" (Patheplay), July 11.—We have seen many pictures of porcelain making, but there is more in this than usual and it makes a good offering.

"EXERCISES OF THE 23RD FRENCH DRAGOONS" (Patheplay), July 11.—On the same reel it shows this regiment bathing its horses.

"ON THE ROADS OF DAUPHINE" (Patheplay), July 11.—A hand-colored film giving views of some beautiful mountain scenery along a valley with villages and a stream.

"BUDD DOBLE COMES BACK" (Selig), July 11.—A race track melodrama that is full of the old quality and which, we believe, will make a popular offering; we find it very entertaining indeed. One of its features is a series of finely photographed pictures of race horses in the race. They were taken over the back of a motor car and bring out the frantic emulation of the losing horse when the competitor is passing him. In fact, the offering is full of horse nature and beautiful horses and this is just what is wanted in such a picture; we know that all who love horses will take great pleasure in it. It is safe to say that, on account of this, it is the best racetrack picture we remember. It has another feature, in that Budd Doble himself plays the leading role and drives the winning horse. He is perfect as a racing man, not a bit "camera shy" and gives a most convincing touch to it. Supporting him, is Bessie Eyton, as Rosebud Doble; George Gaffney, as Doble's driver; Frank Clark, as the villian; and Wheeler Oakman, as his son. The script, by Frank Clark, was produced by Colin Campbell and both deserve much credit. A good offering.

"ENTERTAINING UNCLE" (Kalem), July 11.—Uncle is a rich, old hypocrite and comes to visit Nephew and his wife, who like good things, but play they don't to please Uncle. The same situation was recently used in a Biograph farce; but here the development is freshly worked out. It is a bit better and makes a fair offering. Light and fairly laughable. The western comedy players made it with Ruth Roland, John Brennan and others in the cast.

"COSMOPOLITAN NEW YORK" (Kalem), July 11.—A series of interesting and clearly photographed views of corners and characters found in the great metropolis. It is fresh and worth while. This freshness is what we most commend in it. That Swedish clock seller, the view of the costumes seen on Fifth Avenue and other bits are very commendable.

"THE STATUE OF FRIGHT" (Eclipse), July 11.—There is something inhuman in the use that a father, an artist, makes of the body of his daughter in this picture, something quite unbelieveable. She had died of a broken heart, because she was jilted. The father finds a letter from the man and by chance meets him. It is the day before his wedding to another woman and the dead girl is lying on her bier in another room. The young man has seen a statue, by the famous artist, of Melancholy and doesn't know that his former sweetheart's father is the artist who made it. He wants to buy it and the artist, when he learns the name of the man, agrees to send it to his house. The young man's house is full of wedding guests and the father brings the corpse of his daughter to uncover instead of the statue. It is a two part subject; but the story is rather slow and, although well acted and graceful, would have been better in one reel.

"THE ENEMY'S BABY" (Biograph), July 10.—There are people in the world as careless as this mother, who leaves her baby on the straw in the back of the wagon and herself rides with her husband, the driver. In this case, the baby falls out and is carried, by chance, back to the man from whom the shiftless family is fleeing. This situation, once it is completely stated, is very human and has a comic tang that will be liked. It is a pretty, well made picture, though the photography is not perfect in all the exteriors.

"WHEN LOVE LOSES OUT" (Lubin), July 10.—A fat man and a lean man are at the same sanatorium and both are trying to get a good shape for the sake of love, who, as it turns out in the end, has a false shape. There was laughter and the audience seemed to be amused. The script is by Lawrence McCloskey and was produced by Joseph Smiley. Jennie Nelson plays the sweetheart and Robert Fisher is her fat lover, Arthur Mathews her thin.

"BUILDING A TRUST" (Lubin), July 10.—On the same reel with the forgoing, this farce comedy by E. W. Sargent and produced by Arthur Hotaling seemed to make a hit with the audience. The Chinese laundryman's getting the Irish cop to keep his rival on the other side of the fence, Mrs. Murphy by name (Mae Hotely), from splashing the clothes on his line with mud, gives a taste of the quality of the fun in this picture. The situation is changed several times as the plot develops, but there is enough truth and freshness everytime to get real laughter.

"THE MOULDING" (Vitagraph), July 12.—This gives a new turn to the story of the artist who marries a pretty young girl from the country. He tires of her, and because of this indifference, which is not very clearly shown, she goes to Europe with a woman of the world and becomes a leader in smart continental life. The social atmosphere is well rendered and some attractive gowns are shown. The husband, upon seeing his wife in Paris, falls in love with her a second time, but she does not return his affection until he has learned his lesson. We liked the girl in the lead, but thought she drew out her poses too long in places. A good release.

"BRONCHO BILLY AND THE WESTERN GIRLS" (Essanay), July 12.—The express office is robbed and the girls and their father call on Broncho Billy for aid. He and his cowboy friends help round up the desperadoes in characteristic fashion. Nothing particularly new about this picture, but it is well handled throughout.

"HER ONLY BOY" (Lubin), July 12.—The wayward son is turned out of his home by the indignant father. He goes West and quits drinking. His letter home is never opened by the father, who dies later. The mother finds the letter and answers it, but the waiting son has become desperate and finds her letter only after he has robbed the mails. He gives himself up, but asks that the letter be returned to his mother, so she will not know of his crime. This is a fair offering, without anything of special interest about it, though well photographed.

"ROUNDING UP THE COUNTERFEITERS" (Kalem), July 12.—The character of the detective work in this number is perhaps open to question; some of it is so open and aboveboard as to be almost ridiculous. Yet the observer follows with no little interest the developments of the story and rejoices when the young detective rounds up the makers of "queer" money. Incidentally he is in love with the cashier in the restaurant and, of course, weds her. Not strong, but quite entertaining.

"DYNAMITE, THE NEW FARM HAND" (Patheplay), July 12.— Another interesting demonstration of the manner in which dynamite is employed to cut ditches, blast out stumps, etc. Its use in planting fruit trees is also shown.

"A LITTLE TRIP ALONG THE HUDSON" (Patheplay), July 12.—On same reel with above. Some interesting views of the Palisades and fine homes along the Hudson river, as seen from a steamer. Views of West Point, Batterman Island, Poughkeepsie bridge, etc., are included.

"THE MISTAKE" (Biograph), July 12.—A western offering, in which the husband thinks his former partner is in love with his wife. He shoots the partner as he is attempting to rescue the wife from drunken Indians. It was not clearly shown where the settlers came from, and their appearance on the scene was not very well accounted for. This story does not vary greatly from former offerings of the kind and is somewhat unpleasant, but is quite strongly handled.

"THE DIAMOND CROWN" (Edison), July 12.—The first of a series of detective stories to be known as the Kate Kirby cases, written by J. Searle Dawley. Laura Sawyer appears as Kate. This first release is a very commendable one; the scenes in the home of Mrs. Wetherby carry a nice air of mystery and are well photographed. The girl, by use of a duplicate key, discovers Mrs. Wetherby in the act of robbing her own guest. Numerous complications are suggested, rather than worked out, but as a one reel detective story this is unusually good.

"A WILD RIDE" (Selig), July 12.—A two-reel number, with the scenes apparently laid in the African veldt. Chief in interest are the scenes where the women are rescued by the young English officer and his friend from the warring natives, the girl's ride for help on an ostrich across the open country, and the spectacular burning of the cabin. Help arrives just in time to save the whites from annihilation. The fighting was so clearly strung out in places that it did not create much suspense, but the offering has enough new features to insure its interest. A good adventure number.

"ON HER WEDDING DAY" (Lubin), July 11.—There is a good deal to the situation exploited by this picture, but it is not made very convincing here. There are scenes in it that recall another picture made by the Thanhouser company some months ago.

"HANNEGAN'S HAREM" (Patheplay), July 10.—A farce giving us a dream of an Irishman. In his sleep, he is made gardener of the sultan's harem; but is troubled by Biddy, who is along and objects to his new work. Such a picture will be popular in certain houses; for there is a good deal of competent acting in it and other elements are broadly popular without being offensive.

"HIS CHINESE FRIEND" (Melies), July 10.—The freshness of this offering is one of its chief merits; but it is a good picture for several reasons. It has, for instance, a Chinese player who is cheery-faced and who acts very creditably. The plot is clear, interesting and human; it has been made convincing by careful handling and, beside picturing life in unusual backgrounds, has itself been freshly thought out. It was taken in the Strait Settlements and gives us glimpses of business life in the East. The three leading players, two of them white, do natural and skillful work, and they, as well as the scenes in which they act, have been clearly photographed. A desirable offering.

"THE CARPENTER" (Vitagraph), July 10.—A mystical picture of Civil War days in which the central point of interest is a character who comes, a stranger, into a home distracted by fraternal war and brings help and peace. The script by Marguerite Bertsch has been produced by Wilfrid North. This character, played by Charles Kent, is dressed in modern clothing and seems just a kindly-hearted man, but by his attitude toward life and by the effect his character has on those with whom he comes in contact, he is made to resemble Christ. He should not have been called "The Carpenter" without more reason, for he looked not at all like a carpenter. The picture can only charitably be said to tell a story; but it does create an effect. The stranger is the picture's one fact and the feeling that it creates holds the spectator strongly, even with the simple, artificial (perhaps artfully careless) means used to bring it out. The author and producer have scored a decided success in this offering.

"A GAMBLER'S HONOR" (Biograph), July 14.—The situation with which this picture opens is so old that one is astonished at seeing it. The gambler, who, somehow, has foreseen the need of having the combination of the safe in the express office, cheats stolen money away from the express man, brother of the girl he loves, in order to return it to the safe. We commend the dash and suspense which develops as the action nears its climax. It is acted in a competent though commonplace way. There is much to commend also in the backgrounds and photography.

"A PAIR OF FOILS" (Edison), July 14.—A perfect fade-away scene carries William Wadsworth, who has stretched himself for a nap, out of a modern bedroom into a burlesque court in the days of chivalry. Here, in his street clothes, he finds himself surrounded by courtiers in the dress of Queen Bess's time. It makes a truly amusing picture and brought out much laughter; for the mixture of every day realism and romance, as set forth by these players, makes fun of both in a clever, wholesome way. One feels like complimenting the producer of such a picture first, because so much depends on him—it is one of C. J. Williams' productions. Yet the author, Paul McAllister, deserves good credit, too. Alice Washburn plays the queen and is one of the funniest figures in it. Edward O'Conner and Dan Mason make good councilors for such a monarch. Robert Milash is her chamberlain. The whole cast does excellently.

"THE LOST DIAMOND" (Kalem), July 14.—A detective story in which a crook, while robbing a house, loses a diamond which a detective finds. We are shown how the crook's efforts to recover the stone, working with the detective's trap, brings about the arrest. But the crook's expectations of finding the gem were hardly justified and this weakens the story. Dexter Reynolds, as the crook, sends Alice Hollister, as his book agent accomplice, to look for the diamond. James Vincent is the detective. It is a clearly photographed picture and the players fill their parts well.

"THE MERMAID" (Kalem), July 14.—A farce with a brand new and rather audacious idea. It made laughter in a small audience and, under better conditions, will, we feel sure, go very well. Irene Boyle, for a joke on a drunken fisherman, has herself wrapped up in a net by her friend (Harry Millard). The fisherman, a tip-top comedy character (J. Bates), thinks her a big fish.

"O'HARA AS GUARDIAN ANGEL" (Vitagraph), July 14.—Another of the O'Hara series, but not so good as the others. No series can hold up very long, and the astonishing thing is that W. A. Tremayne, the author, has found so many good stories for this character. A new character is introduced, Bob, played by Joseph Baker, who makes love to Aileen (Norma Talmadge), and O'Hara (Van Dyke Brooke) is on hand to save her from him. The other characters are the same, except that Beatrice McKay, a little girl next door, is also introduced. The plot is weak and rather illogical. The photography is fair. It was produced by Van Dyke Brooke.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY" (No. 32), July 14.—The usual good things include a picture of exercises at the University of Virginia when Champ Clark came there to make a speech.

"THE ONLY CHANCE" (Selig), July 14.—The producer of this picture, William Duncan, did better than the one who spliced it up. Everything that was needed for an exciting rush toward the climax is present; but the scenes are made to linger until there is no stir or vigor left. Freight and passenger trains are approaching each other and nothing can save a collision except a gasoline track car which is sent out to overtake the passenger train. The freight engine is shown puffing along; it looks like a rattlety-bang affair and, when we look at it for a whole moment, becomes almost laughable. Those scenes ought to have been cut short and shown oftener and the same is true of the passenger train scenes. It would have been better to have shown a picture of some sharp curve also, so as to suggest a point of danger at which the two might have come together. The scenes and backgrounds are full of fresh interest and keep the picture alive all through. The script is by C. Chester Wesley. William Duncan plays the leading role with Lester Cuneo, the man who let the trains get into danger. The photography is very clear.

"THE DIAMOND MYSTERY" (Vitagraph), July 14.—Special feature picture in two parts. The fine quality of the photography is the first thing that will be noticed in this offering. The acting of the players is thus given a perfect medium and both reels are filled with many admirable things, bits of character drawing, flashes of insight with the intelligent setting forth of situations that makes a story credible. The average spectator will like it very much; because there is no dragging in it; it is full of life from beginning to end and it is also full of big things, such as the crowded grandstand of a race track. Now and then, it shows carelessness in production. For instance, when Phelps (Herbert L. Barry) examines the bottles in the laboratory of Moore (Charles Kent), the inventor of the fictitious diamond formula, he is supposed to be calling on the girl (Leah Baird); but he never sits down—he comes in, examines the things while talking to her and then hurries out. Charles Kent's facial expression is at times wonderful. Mary Maurice plays his wife and shows how the situation bites her. Leah Baird plays a charming girl with creditable smoothness. Courtenay Foote fills with dignity a conventional part, the detective. The others, Earle Williams, E. K. Lincoln, Charles Edwards, Joseph Baker, Rogers Lytton and Frank Mason, deserve mention.

"SOMETHING ROTTEN IN HAVANA" (Essanay), July 15.—A farce written about a box of very bad cigars. It is rather crude and there was little laughter, but it has elements that will please some.

"WHERE IGNORANCE IS BLISS" (Essanay), July 15.—On the same reel is this very short comedy hit. It is well acted and amusing; but very slight indeed.

"THE TREE AND THE CHAFF" (Selig), July 15.—As an illustration of the text about the righteous that groweth like a tree and the unrighteous that, like chaff, the wind bloweth away, this picture may be of use to Sunday schools and the like. The first nine tenths part of it is very carefully thought out and effective. It is so well prepared and played that the old story becomes quite fresh and newly interesting, so that we enjoyed watching it. But that "home coming" to the old barroom is most unconvincing and weak and, after what had gone before, so is the method of conversion. We think that, if the opening of the picture had been the father's reading the text to his son, it would have been even stronger. Kathlyn Williams plays the girl; Barney Furey the man, and Al. W. Filson his father. The photography is clear in most of the scenes.

"DENIZENS OF THE DEEP, CRABS AND LOBSTERS" (Patheplay), July 15.—An interesting picture of these queer creatures with whom, as far as taste goes, nearly everyone is familiar. It is clearly photographed.

"HIS BETTER SELF" (Lubin), July 15.—In none of Arthur Johnson's pictures have we ever seen anything that was coarse or vulgar and we want to commend again the delicacy with which, in this picture, he handles a situation dealing with the border land between love and its darker counterpart. Of course, the author, George Terwilliger, deserves credit, too. The producer, in the role of a man of easy morals, has met a village girl (Lottie Briscoe), whom he has taken home to live with him without the ring. The girl becomes disgusted and leaves him: is found and protected by a charitable woman (Florence Hackett). It was necessary to bring the two together again and the author has stalked his climax like a sportsman. There is a little group of scenes at Florence's that run into each other as naturally as possible. The position of the girl is peculiar and we are made to forget its improbability by the fact that the author has recognized that this is so clearly, and implied it in his stage business. The outcome seems too simple to be foreseen, but is effective. There are some lovely sets and pictures, clearly photographed.

"IN THE GARDEN" (Edison), July 15.—A story of a misunderstanding and for the sake of human charity. In the opening situation, Augustus Phillips finds a young friend of his, Richard Tucker, in a garden and learns that he and his fiancee, May Abbey, have had a quarrel, so he tells him the tragic story of his own quarrel in the former generation. There are some beautiful scenes in the part that sets forth the first situation and also in the old man's story and the effect of the offering as a whole is pleasing, though not great; for Augustus Phillips doesn't reach his best work and doesn't strongly convince us. Gertrude McCoy plays the sweetheart whom Augustus had quarreled with and who had died.

"MY LADY IDLENESS" (Vitagraph), July 15.—A study of idle society women, the husband of one and their men friends. It shows the small jealousy and petty spiteful intrigue of idle folks and makes a good offering, for it was carefully thought out and develops strongly, except at the climax, where the ostentatious kiss misses the impression desired—an arm over the shoulder of the girl would have been more convincing. Eliza G. Harrel, the writer, deserves much credit and the producer, William Humphrey, has made most of it very effective indeed. Leah Baird plays the idle woman with often stunning effect. Dorothy Kelly is pleasing as her sister. William Humphrey makes a dignified husband. Louise Beaudet is the gushing friend and trouble-maker. Earle Williams is the artist and S. Rankin Drew, the baron.

Independent

"THE STRANGE WAY" (Reliance), July 19.—Steve is a wanderer on the open road; Edith is a favorite of fortune. She steps off a waiting train into a daisy field and he saves her from the hands of a tramp. The train moves away and she becomes unconscious. The love interest develops naturally and she refuses to go back to her former home, having found the Arcadia of her dreams. Rather a pretty story and worked out with a fair degree of strength.

"MARIA ROMA" (Reliance), July 23.—Rosemary Thebe appears in this as a Roman singer and Alan Hale as her American admirer. The manager becomes enraged at their marriage and vows he will have revenge. The principal scene is where the manager bribes a tenor, years later, and appears in the cast of Carmen for the purpose of stabbing the girl. Her husband springs from a box and saves her. Without being particularly strong, this is an entertaining number.

"BRETHREN OF THE SACRED FISH" (Thanhouser), July 20.—A very pleasing little comedy, in which the butcher is a "joiner" and is initiated into the new lodge in a very funny manner. A lot of good, clean amusement in this and plenty of action.

"IMPULSE" (Majestic), July 13.—The man and wife, in desperate straits, are about to rob the miser next door, when they discover a thief entering the room. The husband goes to the rescue, and saves the miser after a vivid encounter. This is one of the best hand to hand struggles we ever saw put on the screen; it holds the observer breathless from start to finish.

"ARMY MANEUVERS AT GOVERNORS ISLAND" (Majectic), July 13—This tail piece, on same reel with above, shows some interesting drill work on Governors Island.

"TANNHAUSER" (Thanhouser), July 15.—A three-reel production, following the story of the opera fairly well. Though carefully costumed, the chorus was too large to appear to the best advantage in the opening scenes, as it had a rather huddled effect. The woodland scenes were striking and attractive, but some of the barefooted nymphs were rather scantily clothed and not as young and slender as might have been expected. Marguerite Snow appeared as Princess Elizabeth, Florence LaBadie as Venus, James Cruze as Tannhauser and William Russell as Wolfram. The production holds the interest and should succeed very well, accompanied by the well known Tannhauser music.

"LOVE AND COURAGE" (Keystone), July 21.—Mabel's lovers become involved in a running fight. There are touches of vulgarity in this which might well have been avoided.

"THE PEDDLER" (Keystone), July 21.—This, on same reel with above, shows Ford Sterling as a peddler. The action is vulgar in this and it is scarcely the thing for a mixed audience.

"A HOSPITAL ROMANCE" (Reliance), July 21.—A very attractive story of two invalids, a poor girl dancer and a rich young man. He pays to have her operated upon by a famous surgeon and she is again able to dance. Later he protests his love for her in the theater, but she says she has given her heart to the man who aided her in the hospital. Later, when he reveals his identity, she accepts him. A pleasing number.

"THROUGH THE TELESCOPE" (Eclair), July 20.—This offering is built up around old situations, beginning with the discharged Mexican, who vows revenge on his successful rival. The girl saves her lover from being carried over the cliff, strapped to his horse. A familiar western offering, presented rather well.

"THE SACRED GAZELLES OF THE PARK OF NARA" (Eclair), July 20.—A very attractive film, on same reel with above, showing the tame gazelles in the Japanese park. They are seen feeding, bathing, etc. The animals will delight women and children.

"THE HALF BREED SHERIFF" (Frontier), July 19.—This western story has several strong situations and holds the interest nicely. The girl refuses him because of his unfortunate birth, but after repeated demonstrations of his heroism, changes her mind. The rounding up of Black Jack was much better than the average situation of this type.

"A POSSIBILITY" (Imp), July 14.—The title refers to what may come about in the course of fifty years if the suffragettes continue winning all along the line. The subject is treated seriously, and while, of course, at this period it will be construed as a burlesque, it is apparent such was not the intent of the makers of the picture. Jane Gail plays well the role of the city girl, sportily inclined perhaps, but certainly no more so than many young men of today. She is in love with a young man of the country, who also is loved by a husky girl of his own vicinage. The city girl lures to her home in the city the young man, who in rather feminine if not effeminate fashion attempts to repel the masculine advances of his admirer. There are many opportunities for comedy which in a keen house will be appreciated. There is much good acting, especially on the part of the man who portrays the father of the young man. The picture is in two reels.

"JUST IN TIME" (Rex), August 24.—An exciting, well constructed drama in one reel, written by Louis Weber. Phillips Smalley enacts the role of the detective. A dictagraph is used to overhear the plans of some dynamiters, who intend blowing up a railroad bridge when the railroad president and his family are crossing it in a train. A racing auto is employed to make a sensational run to head off the train, which is done successfully. While not very probable in certain respects this story moves briskly and arouses much enthusiasm. A good release.

"NIHILIST VENGEANCE" (Victor), July 18.—A story in which much attention has been paid to costumes. There is an absence of restraint in the acting, which is of the melodramatic sort. The plot is conventional. A man is condemned on forged documents, but is saved from death at the last moment. By reason of the subject, the picture should prove of special interest in Jewish or Russian communities.

"THROUGH STRIFE" (Rex), July 13.—This effort of the Smalley-Weber company, while not deficient in strength, at the same time is not as entertainment up to its usual standard. The "strife" is brutality on the part of a husband.

"FLOWER FESTIVAL AT PASADENA, CAL." (Rex), July 13.—On the same reel is this short review of a recent carnival.

"THROUGH MOUNTAINS MAJESTIC" (Gaumont), July 24.—A short scenic number, depicting a famous sight-seeing route across a region of mountains and waterfalls. The use of the illustrated map, pointing out the exact location of the train at different points on the trip, was helpful.

"WHEN THE CARDS WERE SHUFFLED" (Gaumont), July 24.—A brisk little comedy, enacted by a French company. The flirtation and subsequent quarrel in the restaurant were well handled; also the proposed duel and arrival of all parties at the home of the girl's mother. For good comedy movement and delicate treatment, this offering is very successful.

"IN DEATH'S SHADOW" (Crystal), July 15.—A melodrama in settings intended to be Mexican, but they lacked in convincing quality.

"COLLEGE CHUMS" (Crystal), July 27.—A bright and pleasing half reel, in which Chester and Belmont pretend to be injured, but the girls discover the deception. This is genuinely amusing.

"BELMONT STUNG" (Crystal), July 27.—The false friend changes the labels on the hair restorer and hair remover. Belmont becomes bald as a result and his girl grows whiskers. On same reel with above. A successful comedy number.

"THE LAST OF THE MADISONS" (Imp), July 24.—A story of love and a feud among mountaineers. It has been worked up originally and has some very strong scenes. The producer, Herbert Brenon, has taken it close to the camera and made much of facial expression, which often becomes deeply absorbing. Jane Fearnley, as Madison's daughter, and William Shea, as her beau, whose family her father hates, have the romantic roles, while Matt Snyder and Mrs. A. Walker, a vindictive old couple, play the girl's parents. There's another youth who is jealous and tells the old man that the lovers are meeting and they go out gunning for Shea. The outcome of it is the death of Madison and, following this, the picture has several weak scenes; does not reach its former strength again until the old woman, aiming to kill the beau, kills her daughter, "the last of the Madisons," in his arms. The old woman's face at this point is a very fine piece of work. The photography is clear and often perfect.

"LITTLE BUSTER" (Gem), July 14.—This picture, in which Sidney Golden plays the small or rather young boy, will make a little amusement of the broad sort at times. The photography is not of the best.

"THEIR LUCK DAY" (Nestor), July 25.—This number, picturing the adventures of two actors out of funds, proves quite amusing. With the exception of the bathing scene, which can be readily eliminated, there is nothing to object to in the film. It tells an entertaining story and ranks fairly well as a comedy production.

"THE OPERATOR AND THE SUPERINTENDENT" (Nestor), July 16.—Yellow melodrama. Girl operator, village villain, thug accessories, girl bound, sends over the wire a "help" call; carried to mountain cabin, pursuit, girl shoved down trapdoor, posse enter, just about to depart, girl kicks pipe with heel, signals in Morse code, rescue, villains arrested, lovers united, everybody happy.

"THE SMALLPOX SCARE AT GULCH HOLLOW" (Frontier), July 17.—Three or four scenes in this picture are so hideous and gruesome that they overshadow the good points of the offering. The people who can enjoy such a spectacle are very different from us; it made us itch just to see it.

"THE LAWBREAKERS" (Bison). July 22.—A two-reel story, with a renegade son of the judge in the leading role. The story is one of villainy throughout, and while it is exciting and interesting, the observer feels that it is not a picture of a very elevating type. There is a very realistic fire scene, a spirited horse race, a race riot, a threatened lynching, and to cap the climax the jail is blown to atoms by a bomb. From a purely sensational standpoint, this is a successful offering.

"THE HEAD HUNTERS" (Bison), July 12.—Perhaps the less said about these two reels the better. They are suited for those who want to see shooting, men falling, knives waving, women running. Juvenile followers of dime novels will unquestionably go into raptures over this film. The picture was seen in the rough; that may not have assisted the reviewer in trying to find out what all the story was about. He signally failed anyway. Good photography, fine backgrounds, big fields and many men cannot make entertainment these days for the average picturegoer. There must be an intelligible story .

"BEHIND THE GUN" (Nestor), July 23.—Behind the outlaw's gun was a man who at least knew what was decent. He had induced the sheriff's son, a weakling, to gamble with gold not his own and had won it from him. Later, wounded to his death, he is helped by the sheriff's wife and gives back the gold so that the boy's father never knows how near to being a criminal his son was. There is action all through the picture and it has several exciting situations. The players have done their parts well and, though much of it has been used before, it will make a serviceable offering. It is a picture that will be liked.

"THE AWAKENING" (Powers), July 18.—There is a strong situation in this picture that, not quite reaching the point of absolute realism, convinces us of its possibility and holds the attention. A very selfish, extravagant woman, commendably played by Jeanie McPherson, is neglecting her child to go speeding around the country in her high powered automobile. It is finally shown that, on starting out one day, she runs over her own baby without recognizing it. The child is brought home and, on her return, she finds a tragedy waiting for her. It is a well made picture with some good sets and is likely to interest.

"WHY RAGS LEFT HOME" (Powers), July 16.—Rags is a Scotch terrier and is taken by the pound man because his owner, Rocco, a little Italian newsboy, has no dog license. Rocco doesn't find it easy to save enough to get the license in time to keep his dog from going the way of all stray dogs. He has the money; but now he finds that a little newsgirl's mother is sick and needs assistance and the struggle in his heart is very well pictured. It is, indeed, a fine offering, for the story is sincerely acted and humanly true in its sorrow and cry for sympathy. It is sure to please everywhere. It was produced by Harry Pollard.

"THE MAGIC NICKLE" (Powers), July 18.—A pleasing picture in line with other stories of children by the Powers Company. It has the qualities of child likeness and is quite convincing. The author is H. C. Griffith and it was produced by Harry Pollard. The nickle is found by a kid who is in disgrace at school; he has not only been kept in, but has been laughed at. The possession of the coin changes affairs. The story that follows is mostly a dream in which the nickle becomes plenty of money and, in quality, the story is quite indescribable, but makes a delightful offering. A good picture everywhere.

"THE SLEEPING BEAUTY" (Venus Feature).—A state rights feature. A three-reel offering, effectively picturing the famous fairy tale named in the title. The costuming and setting are not lavish, but adequate, and carry the atmosphere of the fantasy very well. The story begins with the birth and christening of the princess. Then the witch predicts that she will prick herself on the spindle at the age of 16 years. This comes about, but instead of dying the princess sleeps 100 years, when the prince comes and awakens her with a kiss. The fairies appear in the fore part of the story. The production is one that will linger pleasantly in the memory

"THE LIFE SAVERS" (Gem), July 21.—A romantic comedy that is developed rather theatrically and jerkily; but its story is interesting. The leading man shows himself a competent actor; the others are only fair.

"THE HALLROOM GIRLS" (Crystal), July 20.—Pearl White has the skill to make such a picture as this charming. She is ably supported by Chester Barnett and others, and the offering is lively, if a little rough in places and should be very acceptable to most audiences. It is clearly photographed.

"HOW MEN PROPOSE" (Crystal), July 20.—On the same reel is this picture with a very slight story. It illustrates how men propose to the same girl and how she bags three the same evening and jilts them the next day.

"THE BROKEN SPELL" (Crystal), July 22.—Pearl White plays the city siren and Chester Barrett the country simpleton whom she was about to fleece. He saves the life of her idolized child and she sends back his check. It is an offering with ably directed scenes full of markedly pleasing quality and with a good deal of humanity in its story's action. The photography is of good quality and we think the people will like it very well.

"BARON BINKS' BRIDE" (Imp), July 26.—A farce of queer characters set in Jayville. It makes use of much rough work, but will be counted a funny picture in most places.

"HY MYERS' CARTOONS" (Imp), July 26.—This on the same reel adds a good deal to the value of the release as an offering to the people; it is very clever and amusing.

"HER NERVE" (Imp), July 17.—A melodramatic offering for the gallery; it won't please the critical. It tells a railroad story and its heroine (Violet Horner), saves not only the money box from the villian, but gets there on time to stop the passenger train that is roaring toward the burning trestle. The plot does not cling to what is logical, but it gives moments that thrill.

"THE YOGI" (Imp), July 21.—An amusing satirical comedy by Fay Wallace and produced by George Rohan Tucker and it does credit to both. The plot is closely knit and substantial; for it deals truthfully with conditions and with life as it is. We are shown the tricks by which fakers, yogis, and their like fool simple minded folk completely and get them in their power. It has plenty of laughter that is always sympathetic, it has a pleasing love story and the proper ending for such an offering, in fact, all the elements of the popular production. On the producer's side, we find the sets and scenes well thought out and the good team work of the players making the story effective. The camera man also did his part well. Charles Graham plays the faker very amusingly and consistently. Jane Gail takes the faker's hired accomplice and also has the romantic role opposite to Matt Moore, as the son of the rich widow, the faker's dupe, and both do their work in an artist-like manner.

"BINKS ENDS THE WAR" (Imp), July 19.—A Binks burlesque farce with lively and often comic action. Such offerings serve well as lighteners and on the same reel is one of Hy Myers' very clever cartoon series that is sure to be acceptable everywhere.

"MAROONED" (Victor), July 25.—The story told by this offering will be liked for its human things and these have been much heightened by the players. It is a well photographed picture of fisher folk set in front of sea vistas and on stony, shore meadows which are scenes that are fresh and pleasing. The acting is restrained and natural—James Kirkwood (also the producer), takes the role of fisherman in love with the daughter (Gertrude Robinson), of an old sea captain (Howard Crampton), and Fred Kelsie plays the "escaped crook" who appears in the village and makes trouble for a time. It is a very fair picture.

"THE ACTOR" (Rex), July 27.—Edwin August plays a strong part in this story of the actor who obtains a chance on Broadway only to have it withdrawn because of the fear of the manager that he cannot competently carry through the big scene. He stages a quarrel with a friend in the club in plain view of the man whose word means so much to him. (There is a wife, sick baby and an old mother back in the interior.) There is a shot and the friend falls. The manager is overcome. While the place is in an uproar the actor walks in smiling. The big scene is thrilling on the screen as well as for the manager, who, of course, re-engages the actor. Mary Charleson plays the wife and does well what little falls to her. There is excellent support, the picture is well staged, and holds throughout.

"PALMISTRY" (Gaumont), July 22.—A number that is sure to prove of general interest. It gives a very fascinating study of palmistry, showing its origin among the ancient priests of India, thousands of years ago. The development is traced by pictures into Egypt and then to Europe, and finally an illuminating series of palms are thrown on the screen and the different lines clearly described. Entertaining and informing.

"FATE AND THREE" (Rex), July 24.—Edwin August, playing the hero, is cast upon a rugged, picturesque coast and taken in by a fisherman and his daughter. He proposes to the girl, who accepts him. A second girl, flirtatiously inclined, tells the first girl he has made love to her. The fisherman's daughter loses her mind. This emotional situation impressed us as very much overdrawn and much too unpleasant for enjoyment. The pictures are well taken, but though the story ends happily, we should not class it as the best form of entertainment.

"HIS WEAKNESS CONQUERED" (Rex), July 20.—Edwin August produces his first picture on his return to the Powers company. He is supported by Mary Charleson, so long with the Western Vitagraph company. The story is of a man who from boyhood up has had a horror of a snake. The picture is well made, the scenes are snappy, gingery. The scene where Edwin discovers Mary, asleep by the trunk of a great tree, and crawling just above her head a great snake, is one to send a creepy thrill down the spine of the average man. That love of the woman conquers the fear of the reptile is natural, logical. The photography is excellent, the backgrounds are well selected. The acting is what is to be expected from these two players; they are competently supported.

"THE FALLEN ANGEL" (Rex), July 24 (2 parts).—There is a distinct punch at the finish of this well-made story. It is a tale of the regeneration of a woman living unwedded with a man of means. The husband of her sister, a burglar, is killed when the door of a safe falls on him. The widow spurns the offer of assistance for herself and her children tendered by her fallen sister. While the widow is at work the sister comes and ministers to the children. The latter fall in love with their visitor as she does with them. Finally the mistaken woman leaves the richly furnished home and starts life anew. How the man finds her and marries her makes a pretty story. Phillips Smalley and Lois Weber play the man and woman, and there is good support, especially from the youngest member of the cast, who is less than a year old, but a sure-enough actor-comedian. It is just such a baby as you have seen at your own table (or may hope to see) and he'll win the heart of every one who sees him.

"MENTAL SUICIDE" (Powers), July 25.—This is not a very pleasant type of story, and the photography is not the best in places, but it contains one very strong, well-acted situation, where the young contractor is caught in the act of accepting a bribe. The girl dies because there was no money with which to give her a change of climate, and this, of course, leaves a rather distasteful feeling with the observer. As a portrayal of conditions as they sometimes exist, it has considerable merit.

"A NOISE FROM THE DEEP" (Keystone), July 17.—This is one of the screamingly funny concoctions which made this company famous as a purveyor of nonsense. It begins with throwing pies and then Mabel and her lover go bicycling. Mabel falls into the lake and the lover flees for help. The fat boy, Bob, saves her. This is but the beginning of the fun. A hose is employed to gurgle in the water which makes everyone think Mabel is still in the lake. The police force come to the rescue on bucking bronchos. Very funny and free from coarseness of any kind.

"FLOTSAM" (Kaybee), July 25.—A two-reel number, nicely pictured throughout. It tells the story of a girl cast up by the sea and taken home by a sea captain. She grows up and he desires to marry her. But she has already fallen in love with an artist and the story is one of her struggle between love and duty. The scenes are laid in Ireland, probably, and the release is one of about average merit.

"THE STREETS OF NEW YORK" (Pilot).—There will be found in another page of this issue a review of this three-reel melodrama, adapted from the play by Dion Boucicault.

"UNMASKED" (Itala).—A special review of this state right subject will be found on another page.

PRESIDENT NEFF TAKES QUICK ACTION.

Suits Started in the Supreme Court of New York to Compel Division of Exposition Money With League as Agreed—Will Reorganize New York State League.

No time was lost by President Neff of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, to protect the interests of the National organization after the bolt of delegates from the convention last Friday. It was known that a considerable sum had been realized from the exposition. By previous agreement this sum was to be divided between the National League, the New York State League and the New York City Association. After the bolt occurred the members of the Exposition Committee, who were among the bolters, declared in unmeasured terms that they would not pay a cent of the receipts to the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, but that they would hold it for the new organization they proposed forming.

Upon this information President Neff consulted his attorneys and caused suit to be brought at once to compel the payment as per agreement, which was to the effect that 25 per cent. of the net proceeds were to be paid to the National League. The summons and complaint in this action, which was brought against the International Exposition Company, operating the Grand Central Palace, was served on the officers of that corporation on Monday, July 14, together with the other parties to the contract. The action was brought in the Supreme Court of the State of New York. Lem S. Miller, of Cincinnati and Tobias A. Keppler, of New York, are attorneys for the plaintiffs. Assurances were given the plaintiffs that no money would be paid to any one until the suit should be decided. This will tie the proceeds of the Exposition up for some time.

It is also understood that similar action will be taken by the regular members of the New York State and City organizations who are not numbered among the bolters.

Another action is contemplated by Clem Kerr and L. R. Thomas, who have contracts with the Exposition Committee of the New York City Association entitling them to commissions amounting to about $2,000.

Call for New York State Meeting.

In line with the determination of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America to discipline the bolting members the following notice has been sent to all members of the New York State League:

"Notice is hereby respectfully given that owing to the fact that there are four vacancies in the offices of the New York State Branch Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, which leaves the executive committee without a quorum a convention is hereby called to meet on Monday, August 11, 1913, at such place as may be hereafter designated for the purpose of electing officers to fill such vacancies.

"R. L. Macnab, Nat'l First Vice-President.

Approved.
"M. A. Neff, National President.
"Geo. H. Wiley, National Secretary."

MUTUAL NIGHTS.

The Mutual booths flew pennants with the Kay-Bee, Thanhouser, Reliance, Majestic, Keystone and other Mutual program trade marks. In addition were busts of James Cruze and Maude Fealy of the Thanhouser players, and photos of Miss Snow of the same company. Then there were large frames containing pictures of the entire American, Reliance and Thanhouser stock companies. Wednesday night was Thanhouser night and the acting staff of this concern distributed souvenirs to the crowds; the following night the members of the Reliance Company held a similar reception. The result of each "reception" was a broken railing on the side of the booth facing the crowds. The Thanhouser Kidlet was the star, of course, of the Thanhouser players' reception; and little Runa Hodges, of the Reliance affair. The Mutual concern itself gave out thousands of red carnations and the entire exhibit was an auspicious success.

GOLDIN MAKING SPECIALS.

Sidney M. Goldin has left for Mt. Clemens for a two weeks' vacation. For three months Goldin has been busy day and night preparing, producing and completing three extra features for the Universal. The first three-reel feature Goldin produced for the Universal was "The Sorrows of Israel," released on June 19th, and conceded to be one of the most stirring dramatic pictures released by this firm. Then came "Nihilist Vengeance," a two-reel Russian feature, followed by "The Heart of a Jewess." Upon his return, Goldin will commence a special Jewish three-reeler which promises to be a sensation.

HUMORS OF FILM TAKING

American Players' Amusing and Other Experiences in Britain —King Baggot Unconscious from Blow by Spear.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

IN the interest of readers of the Moving Picture World I visited historic Chepstow, South Wales, last Friday, and there saw the "American invaders," under the direction of Mr. Herbert Brenon, storm the ancient tower and town in the consummation of what is bound to be a successful film of "Ivanhoe."

So far as Chepstow was concerned, such a humorous touch has pervaded the whole production—due mainly to the facetious interference of a small group of London pressmen who would be in at everything—that it would be an unfaithful account that did not make reference to it. But reverting to the more serious side, whatever may be said of the production involving English scenes and settings, any possible animosity from either manufacturers or patriots, seems to have been dwarfed in face of the proclamation made in super-fatted type by one newspaper that: "Mr. Brenon, the producer of the Imp Film Company's 'Ivanhoe,' at Chepstow, is an Englishman, having been born in London and educated at St. Paul's and King's College." Yet to those familiar with matters kinematographic such an extraneous matter as the nationality of the producer can make no perceptible difference in the result and it would, indeed, appear a poor outlook for the industry on both sides of the Atlantic if a spectacle including such a galaxy of photoplayers of proved popularity as "Ivanhoe" does could not be accepted upon its intrinsic merits alone.

First we have Miss Leah Baird, formerly with the Vitagraph Company, as Rebecca; then Mr. King Baggot in the lead as Ivanhoe; Miss Evelyn Hope, late of the Aldwych Theater, London, as Rowena, and Mr. Scott-Craven as the Black Knight. The identities of the host of less important characters—Friar Tuck, Robin Hood and the rest of his merrymen—I have not yet been able to ascertain, beyond the mere incidental that four of the armored stalwarts hailed from Fleet street and that another was the representative of a newly formed trade journal.

To his remarkable insistence upon securing an absolutely perfect record no words of mine can pay too high a tribute to Mr. Brenon. For the great scene of the play, the assault on the castle, the whole of the ancient edifice, courtyard and grounds, with its beautiful prospect of the River Wye, were hired, lock, stock and barrel, from the Duke of Beaufort. Just try to imagine one of the many scenes that are the links in the chain of "Ivanhoe" that have been enacted here during the past fortnight. Two figures in a moss-grown archway, an agonized shriek and a flash of red as Rebecca, the Jewess, dashes past the cameraman.

"No, it won't do. Get the light full on your face this time and let your hood flow in the air," shouts out Mr. Brenon irritatedly from behind the cameraman, as he prepares to take again the same incident for the eighth time. Later I heard of him vociferously reproaching a doughty Saxon thane in Chepstow marketplace because he carried a sword a decade or two out of date.

One Fleet street scribe of my acquaintance has also very confirmed opinions of the thoroughness of Mr. Brenon. He came up to do a "special" for his paper and in order to be in the swim applied to the producer for a job. Mr. Brenon grasped the novelty of the situation and set him on to rehearse the part of the Norman valet who is thrown from the turrets by Ivanhoe. After an encounter with two Saxo-Norman-American knights riveted to the crown in armor, who were discovered practicing the jelly wobble in the courtyard, he hastened to the local drill hall to don his trappings. His first adventure was to be thrown from the battlements. He was hurled down five times before Mr. Brenon was satisfied, while (according to his own words), in his next great comedy scene, he was cast into the moat by a jester who did not seem to care how much film he used so long as he got his victim in with the right kind of splash. He was rescued by two colleagues, but he turned up again next day with his armor spick and span to lend a hand in the final attack on the castle.

Two hundred men were drawn up on the lawn below the battlements—recruited mostly from the local ironworks, which closed down for the occasion, and armed to the teeth with javelins and battleaxes. Some of the American players will have good and bodily reason to remember their encounter with the blacksmiths of Chepstow. In the midst of the fray King Baggot, who played Ivanhoe, was accidently struck on the head with a spear, but he managed to struggle on until he saw the others cease. Then he dropped senseless on the grass and had to be medically attended.

Then came the storming of the building by the ranks. The mob of carefully rehearsed ironworkers, including, of course, our friend the pressman, saddled their harness and charged the gateway.

"Fight like blazes, boys, and there's sandwiches and beer when you get through," howled Mr. Brenon down a megaphone. That did it. They entered into the spirit of the fight with an ardor that was more than real. In fact, judging by the rush for the local doctor a few minutes later, it is safe to say that those ironworkers were much too enthusiastic.

After this I left the scene to get my connection for London, lest the blacksmiths and ironworkers should decide to continue the fight on their own account. Of my Fleet street friend I heard no more beyond that he had been gently tapped on the skull with a crowbar in the grand slam.

BRITISH NOTES.

Mr. Seymour Hicks and Miss Ellaline Teriss are booked up in the day time now for the next five years with the Zenith Film Company, which is to produce six big films each year, featuring these artists. Dickens' "Scrooge" will be ready shortly, "Garrick" is on the carpet; then in a few months the two will set to work on a 5,000-footer entitled "Joan of Arc."

At the recent Booksellers and Stationers' Congress, held at Torquay, one of the delegates was noticed to bear a remarkable resemblance, facial and physical, to John Bunny. The man was extremely annoyed at being followed about by the crowd.

A literary friend of mine, while glancing through a list of recent American film releases, commented upon the frequent excursions made by American manufacturers into the realms of English literature. "Why doesn't some patriotic American exploit the works of Whitman, Cooper or Poe?" remarked my friend, who, by the way, is a litterateur of distinction. "Some of the stories of Poe are especially worthy of dramatization particularly for a public that revels in mystery and weird feats of imagination." He mentioned as likely subjects, "The Gold Bug," "The Black Cat" and "William Wilson," and I have no doubt that if an enterprising producer glanced through these he might find a theme for a photoplay that is absolutely original, despite its ghastliness.

Mr. Frank Burlingham, a London photographer, has succeeded in recording a moving picture ascent of the Matterhorn in Switzerland.

Mr. Elwin Reame, a photographer best known for his artistic studies of women, has temporarily taken a studio at Esher for the taking of "La Cigale," with Miss Ivy Close in the lead.

Absolutely the newest billposting dodge is to post two bills on a hoarding, one of them being upside down. Over the reversed notice or picture is the wording, "For Aviators Only." Everybody stopped to read one, which advised airmen, after alighting, to make another flight to the —— Palace.

The Edison players in England are at present located in Devon and Cornwall, where they are producing a series of fisherfolk subjects. At one rehearsal in which Miss Nisbett was concerned the party were caught by the tide and had to rush for the rocks. Smuggling pictures in which the British coastguards are shown at work have also been made, while in every case the background and settings are constituted from the fine scenery to be found in the locality.

The Imp Film Company, of America, has already finished Scott's "Ivanhoe" and its next venture, I am told, will revolve around Mr. Grahame White's projected flight across the Atlantic.

The Leeds Watch Committee are threatening to take action against showmen offering sweets as an inducement to children to visit picture theaters.

MUTUAL TAKES NEW OFFICES.

The Mutual Film Corporation, now located at 60 Wall Street, New York, is about to move its general offices to the fourteenth floor of the Masonic Temple Building, 23rd Street and Sixth Avenue. It will also have space on the ground floor for the purchasing agent, J. N. Naulty, formerly of the General Film Company, and later of the Kinetograph Company, who has been appointed purchasing agent for the Mutual.

Among other things, the Mutual will have a handsome exhibition room in its new quarters, and the Empire Exchange will be located there.

NEW RELIANCE STUDIO.

General Manager Ritchey Closes Deal for the Purchase of the Home of Clara Morris.

The Pines, the home of Clara Morris, the well-known actress, has been purchased by the Reliance Moving Picture Co. as the site for its new studio. The estate, which was saved to her through the formation of a holding company that raised the money which prevented the foreclosure of the mortgage, comprises about four acres of high ground, overlooking the Hudson River at 262nd Street and Riverdale Avenue, New York City. The line dividing Yonkers from Manhattan passes through the grounds and will cut the stage of the new studio, so that it will be possible for a Reliance actor in New York to play a scene with an actor in Yonkers without any trouble.

In addition to the regular studio, which will accommodate several stage sets at the same time, a large open air studio will be erected with the idea of gaining scenic effects not possible on an ordinary stage.

Work on the new plant will be rushed so that it can be put into complete operation at an early date.

"HAWKSHAW, THE DETECTIVE."

Charles Streamer, manager of the Eagle Feature Film Company, 5 East 14th Street, New York City, is promoting a four-reel feature entitled "Hawkshaw, the Detective." He was busy during convention week boosting the sales and reports some results that are quite flattering.

PEARL WHITE TO TOUR EUROPE.

Pearl White, the charming and ever popular star of "Crystal Films," sailed for Europe on board the Olympic on Saturday, July 5th. Miss White will spend about six weeks on the continent, visiting all the principal cities and the studios of the foreign film manufacturers, and she will study the different methods of acting in all the studios abroad. Miss White will also appear personally at several photoplay theaters in England, France and Italy. After touring the continent Miss White will return to America and will resume her work in "Crystal Films." Miss White was given a great send-off by her many friends here, and several feet of film of both Miss White and the Olympic leaving her dock were taken and will be shown in the next release of the Animated Weekly of the Universal Program.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

THE first international motion picture exposition is at an end. It was a financial success—the number of paid admissions proves that. This fact of course concerns the promoters; it demonstrates that people will pay money to look at the appliances that enter into the making and exhibiting of motion pictures—that is, perhaps it does. It would be highly illuminating, however, to know the proportion of these paid admissions that were the result of a desire to see, in the first place, the pictures that were being shown in the four theaters; in the second place, to see in the flesh the actors and actresses with whose shadows on the screen picture followers are so familiar. It is probable that to the latter factor is to be ascribed the larger percentage of the attendance of the outside public.

But the real success of the exposition is not to be gauged by the measure of public interest aroused. Above all, it was a trade affair. So it is in the amount of actual business developed, of money turned over, with which the industry is concerned.

Of the highest value to the trade as a whole was the opportunity for getting together, for fraternization, for interchange of views as to what may best promote the prosperity and insure the stability of the motion picture industry. Who will say that this close association of the heads of the many allied interests of the motion picture industry may not predicate the formation of a National Kinematographic Board of Trade?

To be sure, the time for the organization of such a body is not yet. At present there are in the ranks of picture manufacturers, for instance, not only opposing, but antagonistic groups. Competitors may organize a parent body and remain competitors. There must be, however, as a condition precedent to the formation of that organization a community of interests, an absence of conflicting. That these differences of opinion—these antagonisms which mark the travail of an industry and which will continue during the transition period through which we are now passing—are bound soon to be ironed out is not only probable. It is logical.

One of the last table parties to retire from the restaurant in the Grand Central Palace on the closing night of the exposition included "Pop" Rock, of the Vitagraph, and "Bill" Swanson, of the Universal.

A notable feature of the exposition was the class of people who thronged the aisles throughout the week. Not that the interested spectators were well dressed and prosperous looking. They were more. The great majority were cultivated and intelligent, easily comparing with any exposition crowd. The small minority comprised those extremely young persons who on Friday and Saturday evenings expended their misguided energies on the small horns distributed by somebody with more money than regard for general comfort. This reprehensible attempt to turn the exposition into an election night or New Year's carnival was the only untoward incident of the week if the crush about the General Film booth on Saturday night be excepted. The latter condition, which was due to overanxiety to get in on the good things being provided by the Essanay, Kleine and Selig forces, was promptly remedied. The horn-blowing was not stopped. It should have been.

Fred Beecroft, whose work lies more among advertising managers than pictures, was approached on Saturday evening at the hall by a gushing female who informed him she had so often admired him on the screen and that she just knew he was the Essanay sheriff. Her chief lament, however, was her inability to learn the name of her favorite. Would he please tell her? Fred stalled for a moment. He was disinclined to disappoint a real fan, but for the life of him he couldn't recall who did portray the famous arm of the law. There was only one name that "Bee" could bring to mind. Getting desperate, he murmured "G. M. Anderson" and fled.

Arthur Mackley, please note.

J. Stuart Blackton, vice-president of the Vitagraph Company, by his speech at the official banquet on Friday night, showed that in the ranks of the manufacturers there is an after-dinner speaker of real quality. One of the stories which caused the most amusement had to do with Mr. Blackton's recent trip abroad. The Vitagraph man was traveling on a train in Italy. In the compartment with him were "two Italian-looking gentlemen." Desiring to be sociable and also anxious to give a tryout to his recently acquired Italian—in the use of which he prided himself he was becoming very proficient—he addressed to his fellow-travelers a carefully thought out interrogation of polite interest. The Italian-looking gentlemen merely looked at him. Thinking he might have failed to make himself clear, Mr. Blackton tried again. The only response was a pained look on the faces of his companions. Somewhat ruffled, but not entirely discouraged, Mr. Blackton, as his train drew near a city, looked out of the window and, noting the fine scenery, remarked upon it in most carefully phrased Italian.

One of his fellow-travelers looked at his companion in deep disgust. "Ai saiy," he growled, "what beastly lingo these dommed dagoes talk!"

MAGIE JOINS UNIVERSAL.

Well Known Film Man Named As Special Representative To the Exchanges and Exhibiting Interests.

A newly created position in the Universal Film Manufacturing Company service is that of "special representative to the exchange exhibiting interests" to which Manager J. C. Graham has called Mr. George A. Magie, until recently general manager of the Pilot Company, which he founded.

George A. Magie.

The Universal is to be congratulated upon securing so capable and conscientious a gentleman for these important duties. During the five years that Mr. Magie has been identified with the film business, he has always held a commanding position in the industry. He organized the Solax Company, and represented that concern in the Sales Company. Later he helped to organize the Film Supply Company, and as previously stated, he formed the Pilot Film Company of Yonkers.

George A. Magie is a native of New York, but received his education in France. Returning to America, he entered the railroad business, and became an expert in railway management. In this connection, he made a trip around the world, reporting on railroad conditions. Later, he was called to London, and spent two years in the British capital in the construction of the underground railway system of the world's metropolis.

While convalescing from an illness, his attention was called to the motion picture business as a field of outdoor activity, and he embarked on his present successful career. He brought to his new pursuit the thorough practical training that he had employed in the highly specialized business of railroading, developing a high efficiency among his lieutenants. George A. Magie is a great fellow for charts, and by thus tabulating the activities of his enterprises, is able to ascertain at a glance its relative state of progress or decline.

PILOT NOTES.

"The Streets of New York," a three-reeler, from the famous play by Dion Boucicault, is now being sold by the Pilot Company on State Rights basis. Several territories have already been sold.

Miss Lottie Pickford, sister to "Little Mary Pickford," is spending a week's vacation at her summer home.

ALBERT W. HALE JOINS MAJESTIC.

Albert W. Hale, who has been making American pictures, has joined the Majestic forces, and is now located at the studio in Fairview Avenue, Los Angeles.

VERNON R. DAY, general manager of the Essanay Company, was there with the usual smile and glad hand for all, though he endured some pain the entire week, caused by a poisoned hand and arm. What pleased Day most was the thought of how easy it is for two distinct, and unknown to each other days, to meet head on at high noon. Ask for an explanation.

If you are a lover of fiction, that real strong love stuff, ask Omer F. Doud, Geo. Kleine's publicity manager, to recite that beautiful poem, "Pretty Peggy." There is a heart throb in almost every syllable. It's good stuff, get it.

Ed. Mock, the "Goat-Man" from Chicago, with Mrs. Mock, were very much present, but on account of the very good natured way he allowed us to pull one or two over on him at the Moving Picture World dinner, I haven't the heart to say any more.

Being very much of a bachelor myself, I regretted the amount of work to be done at the convention, in sympathy with Stanley Twist, who, for the reason that he was kept constantly on the job, had no opportunity to don many of those breezy Western-cut togs he so thoughtfully brought with him. Forgetting the fact that he ignores the monocle in his make-up, he sure is some classy boy. By the way, did you get one of those fancy monogrammed cigs which represents a portion of his allowance?

I do hope that Don Meaney, the poultry expert, from Packingtown, will tell me the remainder of that "tale" he almost finished, on the night of the third day. Get me, Don? I'm sure interested.

Frank Hough, manager of Geo. Kleine's supply business in Chicago and one of the bunch that arrived for the big show, was appointed sergeant-at-arms of the suite at the Hotel Belmont, occupied by the "sleepless five" from Chicago. His duty was to preserve order among the fellows during the "at home hours" in the hotel. He had absolutely nothing to do.

One would never think Chicago was a soft coal town to see Mr. R. R. Nehls, the American Film Company's manager, when he appeared at the Convention Hall in a suit of spotless white flannel, unless he had it made especially for the occasion. If that be the case it is a shame, for it didn't last long. They took Nehls for a little joy ride, up the line, on the night of the second day, and he got all mussed up.

I think that Bill Kalem Wright was kidding us last week. Every time he appeared at the hall he wore a different suit, and I am positive he had a hat and shoes for each outfit.

Young McChesney was there all week, strengthening his popularity by no other means than his happy disposition. He has the best wishes of everybody that he succeed in his new position, as sales manager for the Edison film.

One of the biggest nights of the week was Thursday, when John Skarrett, manager of the Nicholas Power Company, and two of his lieutenants piloted a bunch of out-of-town exhibitors, and myself, along Broadway after dark. It is a cinch that Skarrett is not from Missouri. You can't show him anything in New York. The following verse, written by one of the party, while waiting for the water, coaxed the elusive smile and another nightcap from the Power's boss:

Here's to the Power's, so slick and clean,
Which projects the best pictures ever seen.
If you want a machine that will surely pay,
Go down tomorrow and buy a Power's 6 A.

"UNMASKED" (Itala)

IN this three-reel picture there are several sensational features. Perhaps the more thrilling is the flight from a mountain top down a cable. The escape from the customs officers to the valley far below of the man improperly detained makes a thrilling spectacle. The experienced film man may not be sure that the object swiftly moving down the lumber carrier is not a dummy, but to the layman the thought will not occur. Another thriller which in charity may be described as an "illusion" is the apparent trip down a mountain slope of the fugitive curled up inside of a giant snowball. The white sphere travels fast, its journey coming to a sudden end when it falls into a pool of water. Of course, the scene flashes and from under the water emerges the supposed traveler. It may be questioned if such faking really adds to the strength of a sensational story. Producers cannot exercise too much care in establishing beyond question the genuineness of striking situations. However, there is in "Unmasked" sufficient material of real merit to carry the picture and hold the interest throughout.

The story is of two engineers employed in an automobile factory. Both are in love with the daughter of the proprietor. To one, Rossi, is given for safe keeping plans of intended improvements. The other, Fleury, photographs the papers and sells them to a rival maker. Of course Rossi is blamed and discharged. He is compelled to go to another country to secure work. While arranging the correspondence of his new employer he comes across the photograph and a letter in the handwriting of Fleury. Immediately Rossi starts back to his native town, taking the incriminating papers with him. On his return he learns that Fleury and Beatrix, his former sweatheart, are to be married in twenty-four hours at the home of Fleury's uncle, on the other side of the mountains. He misses the conveyance that would enable him to reach the place on time. He determines to cross the mountain on foot. He struggles through the snow. He is arrested by a customs official. Being permitted to join the customs men in their sports he is seen excavating the snow from the trunk of a lay figure. Then we see the ball rolling down the slope, striking the water, and the man emerging. A mountaineer gives him dry clothing. When the officers reach the house Rossi jumps through the window, and on a cable with a pulley attachment swings rapidly to the valley below. As he takes a train out of the mountain hamlet there is shown the wedding party witnessing the legal formalities. Before these preliminaries are concluded Rossi enters and denounces Fleury. The wedding does not take place and the guests depart.

Scene from "Unmasked" (Itala).

The picture is well worth while. There are the usual Itala photography and Itala settings. There are fine views of snow-covered mountains. Also from a dramatic standpoint the picture is praiseworthy.

Otto Luedeking, one of the delegates of the Cincinnati local, is a prominent dry goods merchant of that city. "Saunterings" of a Cheerful Liar.

By William H. Kitchell.

IT was pretty hot weather for interviewing a studio, but this was the biggest studio in the world. Mr. Harrison had missed it, somehow; and everybody else who could do interviewing was covering the exposition. Luckily, the writer had a friend who knew the office boy's brother. We got past the sign on the door by giving an affidavit stating implicitly that the name and location of the studio and the identity of its directors and publicity man—we had to make a special affidavit for the publicity man—should never be revealed. But we had to get inside somehow, in order to tell what happened.

The publicity man was the chaperon. He was as good-looking and unassuming as most of his tribe, and he was better educated than some. He had a neat little office, with one typewriter and several new ideas of how the publicity bureau of a moving picture studio should be run.

"Here are our releases for two months ahead," he began, bringing out a sheaf of neatly printed bulletins. "You will notice that we photograph the most absorbing moment in the most artistic scene as the subject for our illustrations. We take pride in writing a good synopsis—but we never exaggerate. The story is taken from the play as filmed, and not from the imagination of somebody who has never seen the production. We have fired seven writers who insisted in altering the plots in order to make better stories. Another man goes Saturday.

"Now for another novelty. You will note that our trade-paper advertisements and advance-sheets never state that our last comedy is 'the funniest laugh-maker' ever produced. Our dramas are not billed in circus-poster English as the last word in photoplays. If we have a release of exceptional quality, we say so frankly. If it is only conventionally good—and our 'conventional' stuff is better than the average 'feature' release—we tell the story simply without superfluous adjectives. If the production is not satisfactory it never gets as far as the publicity man. Extravagant praise of an average release kills the success of a 'feature.' I am the survivor of eleven publicity managers who tried to stretch the truth. Last month I used the word 'hilarious' in describing a comedy that was only ordinarily funny. I offered to resign, but the boss said he would give me another chance."

"This is the scenario department," he continued, opening another door. "A new editor is expected tomorrow. We have had eleven in two years. The trouble? Some were too fond of saving money for the boss. Most experienced men who come here arrive with the impression that all is needed in a story is a minimum of plot with a maximum of sensation, and that expense is the prime consideration. A story that gets away from the conventional means extra work all around. The backgrounds must be unusual, the story must be worked out with ingenuity, and additional care is needed to get the narrative 'over' with the actors. This is the cause of most studio failures. The actors are told in a conventional way what to do in a conventional way, and they act accordingly. We begin right in the scenario department by writing live plots, regardless of the few dollars necessary to work them out naturally. We get results.

"It isn't the 'story' so much as it is the 'work-out,'" he went on. "A brand new variation of a shopworn 'situation' is always preferable to the conventional production of a novelty. The brand new story is apt to be unnatural and unconvincing. This is the trouble with most revamped stories. There is one basic 'situation' that has been used within six months by seven manufacturers. The original story had the novelty of being both natural and unconventional. What was the result? It has been 'improved upon' six times, each with a striving after effect and sensation, and it was 'done' last as a three-reel. And the six revamps were horrors, not because of the story, but because they were revamped after the same model. Conventionality is the curse of photoplaydom."

The studio director who was interviewed next had the same opinion of the development of his art.

"We get our actors from the 'legitimate'—or the farm," he observed. "The average studio actor can swim and ride a horse and face a camera without gazing at the eye-piece. He can rescue a heroine from an imaginary locomotive, and write two-page letters with nine sweeps of an inkless pen. He can pose—but he can't act. Not for us, anyway. He's been brought up wrong.

"Sensation has ruined him. Can you imagine Richard Mansfield or Edwin Booth doing good work as a 'gentleman burglar' or an escaped convict? It was the moving pictures that drove out the Laura Jean Libby 'school' of melodrama, and it is the pictures that has brought in the same brand of 'Art' to a public that never wanted it again. There is merit in sensation, but when it is overdone, it becomes conventional, and worse. Our exchanges report that the studios which are following our example by eliminating the criminal brand of melodrama are making the biggest hit with photoplay patrons. Crimeless melodrama is bad enough!

"How can we tell a real actor from the imitation variety? There are many signs. One method of detection is the 'match test.' If our gentleman lead has to light a cigar at his first rehearsal, we furnish the cigar and watch the result. If he throws the match upon the studio floor—as most picture actors do—we hand him the blue envelop and inform him gently that we only hire day-laborers at night. If he strikes a pose for an inspiration and ejaculates between his teeth 'I'll do it!' we know he won't. A lead who has been overworked by a director who used to play villain parts along a one-night circuit will never be unconventional."

Just then the proprietor of the studio entered. He had been out studying the effect of his releases upon photoplay patrons, and he was visibly perturbed.

"If I can find the ignoramus who produced last Tuesday's story, I'll have him bounced!" he exclaimed. "Even if the character did die off-scene, he had no business to die at all in one of my productions. It never happened before, and it shouldn't have happened once!"

The director had his nerve with him.

"You passed it yourself, sir. A friend of yours gave you the script, and you left orders to produce the story without alterations. You said he was a particular friend of yours, and that his judgment upon art was infallible."

"I—I did!" admitted the proprietor, crestfallen. "And I was wrong. But I'll never do it again. I'll fire myself. I'll take a vacation for six months, and spend the six months in an Insane Asylum studying unconventionality."

If he hadn't been an imaginary proprietor talking to an imaginary director in an imaginary studio, he would have carried out his resolution.

"A HERO AMONG MEN" (Lubin).

This exciting photoplay is a revival of the melodrama of years ago, when melodramas were written by talented dramatists and were admitted to be the acme of dramatic art. It is a story of to-day and the characters are masters and men. The strike scene, which is a feature, teaches a beautiful lesson of moderation and proves that heroism will overcome passion, and that the one touch of nature makes all men kin.

Ethel, daughter of Richard Menton, president of the Imperial Arms Company, is tacitly engaged to Martin Bently, the secretary. For her health she goes with her mother to the country and there meets Harry Landers. They enjoy frequent outings and eventually fall madly in love. Harry proposes, but Ethel tells him she is engaged—she, however, being unable to combat her love, begs her mother to take her back to the city home. Some months later Harry is offered a position by Menton, which he gladly accepts. There he discovers that Martin is his rival. The men of the Arms Plant have made a demand for a 10% raise and, being refused, organize a militant strike. They attack the executive building and the officials barricade themselves in Menton's office. A drunken watchman has fallen asleep in the basement and dropped a cigarette stump in a heap of excelsior, setting the building on fire. Menton swoons of heart failure and Ethel, who is in the office, is in hysterics. Harry drags Menton down to the yard, instructing Martin to look after Ethel; he, however, is panic stricken and leaves her in the burning building. The packages of ammunition begin to explode. Disregarding this, Harry rushes into the building and brings Ethel to safety amid the cheers of the striking mob. Menton gives in to the demands of the men and gives his daughter to the brave man, who saves her life.

PATENTS COMPANY REDUCES LICENSE FEE.

A circular has been sent to exhibitors by the Motion Picture Patents Company announcing that it has reduced the weekly license fee from $2.00 to ninety cents, and that the fee will hereafter be paid by the exchanges. In the same circular exhibitors are advised that they are liable if they run independent pictures on a licensed machine, though it was not the intention of the Patents Company to cancel any licenses because thereof.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"HOME, SWEET HOME" (Lubin).

Lubin has made a homely story that will appeal to the observers of parental love. There is a rich vein of comedy in the tale, but it is replete with the pathos of beautiful simplicity. The cast has employed four of the Lubin star players and is mounted with realistic scenery of the green lanes of New England. It is one of the sweetest stories ever given to a photoplay.

Success had come to John Barbour and his wife, Nell, the new home had been furnished luxuriously, when the happy couple conceived the idea of taking Ma and Pa away from their country cottage to live with them in the city. Ma and Pa did not like the idea, but were finally persuaded and the little country house was closed up and the furniture carted away to old Solo's second-hand store. Old Sal and the surrey were given to a neighbor and Ma and Pa went to town. John and Nell had fitted up their rooms beautifully, but the fine furniture did not fit. The old folks wanted the chairs and bed that had made them comfortable for over forty years. Presently John noticed that Ma and Pa made frequent trips to the old village; at last he became suspicious and determined to investigate. He saw Ma go into the second-hand store and buy Pa's old easy chair, when she came out Pa entered and bought Ma's rocker, to be kept until called for. The situation was clear, the old folks wanted the old home. "John," said Nell, "we are trying to make the dear, old couple happy and are just killing them." Next day John and Nell visited the second-hand shop, paid for the whole outfit and Pa and Ma were hustled into the home they had missed so keenly.

NOVEL TICKET SELLING DEVICE.

One of the very interesting exhibitions made at the new Grand Central Palace during the recent exposition, which attracted universal attention, was that of The Automatic Ticket Selling & Cash Register Company, which had its display adjoining that of the Edison Company.

The automatic ticket selling machine which this comoany is placing on the market, was invented by Mr. A. J. Meier, of St. Louis, who is also the inventor of the famous duplex adding machine, and he has certainly shown himself a genius in developing and perfecting this ticket selling machine, which is rapidly being adopted by the managers of the leading moving picture houses throughout the United States and Canada.

This machine, while simple, enables the operator to sell either 1, 2, 3, 4 or 5 tickets by simply pressing a button and pushing a foot lever, and each of the tickets as issued, no matter in what number, or how rapidly, is automatically registered. This enables the theater manager to serve his patrons from two to five times as fast as by ordinary methods, and at the same time he can keep an accurate record of the daily receipts, as well as to prevent any "leaks" in the box office, in the event that the employees are not strictly "on the square."

"MARIA ROMA" (RELIANCE).

Rosemary Theby, as Maria Roma, the beautiful, temperamental Italian opera singer, does some of the finest work of her career in this picture.

The film tells the story of a jealous Italian manager, Capucci, who, losing his greatest star through her marriage with an American, threatens to be revenged on both the girl and her husband. Maria, frightened for her husband's safety, runs away to America, where Capucci finds her singing in a cheap Italian theater and bribes the tenor to allow him to sing his role in the last act that night. The opera is "Carmen," with Maria in the title role. As the girl turns to the tenor, she finds it is Capucci, dagger in hand. He means to turn the stage tragedy into a real tragedy. Her husband, always searching for Maria, has dropped in to see the performance and leaps from his box to the stage in time to save his wife's life. Capucci, about to be taken away by the police, commits suicide.

Scene from "Maria Roma" (Reliance).

"BOOK OF ESTHER" IN PICTURES.

George K. Rolands, special scenario writer for the Universal, has completed a scenario on the "Book of Esther," taken from the Old Testament, and submitted it to Mr. Paxton, director-in-chief of the Biblical and Historical Motion Picture Company. A feature of all Mr. Roland's Biblical scenarios is the fact that all sub-titles will be written in original Hebraic letters, with appropriate English translations.

"THE STREETS OF NEW YORK" (Pilot)

This strong melodrama, which is made in three reels, is an adaptation of Dion Boucicault's play. Travers Vail is the producer. There are present all the elements of an old-fashioned stage play. The cast is a good one. Old picturegoers will be interested in seeing Madge Orlamond, who for so long a time has done such fine character work in Arthur Johnson's Lubin company. Miss Orlamond here sustains her reputation for consistent acting. J. H. Roberts carries well the role of Captain Fairweather. Herbert Barrington, who plays Gideon Bloodgood, the crooked banker, has much to do. His work on the whole is good, although at times he inclines to the melodramatic. J. W. Hartman as the badger, the confederate of the banker, will please.

Scene from "The Streets of New York" (Pilot).

The story, a synopsis of which is printed in another column of this issue, is of a banker about to abscond, who finds his bank saved by the sudden death of a depositor of $100,000, the receipt of which falls into the hands of the intending defaulter. The witness of the crime, the confederate, is given money and goes West. Later, when down and out, the confederate returns to New York, and aids, owing to a series of contributory circumstances, in restoring to the starving wife and family of the depositor the money the banker had withheld. The interest is sustained throughout.

KINEMACOLOR OFFICE IN KANSAS CITY.

Felix Feist, author of "If Time Was Money I'd Be a Millionaire," and many other popular songs, who has since devoted his talents and enthusiasm to exploiting Kinemacolor, will make an extended tour through the Southwest in the interests of the natural color motion pictures. The recent Moving Picture Exposition resulted in so many applications for Kinemacolor service from that section of the country, that it becomes necessary to establish a new distributing station for prompt film service. Mr. Feist will open an office in Kansas City and thence tour Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Texas, inspecting theaters and installing Kinemacolor service in those States. Pianists and musical directors en route will please play "Senora," "Can't You See I'm Lonely" and "The Bullfrog and the Coon," just to make Felix feel at home when he hears his own songs so far from Broadway.

"FANTOMAS."

The Latest Gentleman-Crook.

The Cracksman vs. Detective field can by no means be described as "worked out" while such excellent productions as "Fantomas" are to be obtained. In this latest series, Gaumonts are said to have excelled all previous efforts in this range, and certainly the description of No. 1, entitled "Fantomas, Under the Shadow of the Guillotine," would lead us to suppose that we have here a truly remarkable melange of mystery and crime, whilst the ingenious manner in which Fantomas is enabled to escape the prison bars and the seemingly inevitable guillotine is something to be remembered. The acting of the play, intrusted to some of the finest living French artists, should leave nothing to be desired—we see the names of M. Navarre in the exacting title role, Mlle. Jane Faber (of the Comedie Francaise), as Princess Danidoff, and Mme. Renee Carll, Messrs. Breon, Melchior, Volbert and Naudier in the support. The Gaumont reputation for excellence of production and photography is an added asset. No. 1 of the Fantomas series will be released shortly.

Hallberg Economizer at the Exposition.

Among the many interesting exhibits at the Grand Central Palace last week, none attracted more attention than the Hallberg A. C. to D. C. Economizer, in the booth of the United Electric Light and Power Company. Many of the exhibitors who had been reading about the wonderful results obtained on the screen by use of this Hallberg Economizer, availed themselves of this opportunity to witness a practical demonstration. Projecting the picture on a plain muslin screen, in a brilliantly lighted auditorium, with hundreds of incandescent lights burning in the very booth in which the picture was shown, the operator manipulated the controller of the A. C. to D. C. Economizer, showing the operation under varying amperes from 30 up to 60 amps. The unanimous verdict of all bears out every claim made by Mr. Hallberg for his A. C. to D. C. Economizer. This has already been amply proven by the number of orders booked for the device.

A NEW LINE OF FEATURES.

Charles Simone announces that he has secured the agency for a new line of feature subjects, to be known under the title of "Venus Features." These pictures are being made by a company under the direction of Thomas Evans, in Hollywood, Cal., and vicinity. The well-known directors, Messrs. Mathews and McDonald have been in charge of the actual work of production. These subjects are said to be of very fine quality. Among the players are Constance Crawley and Arthur Maude, celebrated English players, and Elsie Albert, and the well-known child actors Mattie and Earl. Two and three reel features will rule.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEW ENGLAND AND CANADA.

"THE Battle of Gettysburg" certainly packed the National Theater, Boston, while this five-reel masterpiece was being exhibited there. Speaking of the picture, Capt. De Witt C. Coffman, commandant of the Boston Navy Yard, said: "Every student of history, as well as every person with a spark of patriotism in him, should see it—its educational qualities are most essential to every person." Of course, such a strong statement, coming from Captain Coffman, was a big advertising point, and it was helpful to the National.

One afternoon last week about fifty Civil War veterans from the Soldiers' Home in Chelsea, Mass., journeyed to the National Theater, Boston, and witnessed the moving pictures of "The Battle of Gettysburg." It had been planned to give 200 inmates of the home an opportunity to enjoy these pictures, but, through some fault in the arrangements for providing automobiles to convey the old soldiers, it was possible to take only about fifty of them to the theater. Those who saw the pictures were most enthusiastic upon their return home.

Mayor John F. Fitzgerald, of Boston, is a true friend of motion pictures, and often expresses himself in no uncertain terms. His honor stated this week at a public gathering that he believes the school board cannot do better than to teach American history with the aid of moving pictures at the schools. As the mayor usually gets just what he wants, it is safe to say that his idea will be "put over."

Cortlandt Barker, manager of the Garden Theater, Waterbury, Conn., is showing the "Quo Vadis?" reels and reports that this picture proved itself to be a good business maker for him.

Waterbury, Conn., has a new theater now under way that should be ready for its opening by Labor Day, unless too many enforced delays come up to prevent. This theater is owned by J. J. O'Neil, but it will be operated by William Fox. The house is now well along, and Mr. Fox, together with his wife, and John Zanft, his general manager, visited Waterbury recently to look over the house. It appears that the question of exits from this theater is giving considerable trouble. Mr. Fox has taken decided issue with the demands of the local building inspector, a Mr. Chatfield, regarding the exits. Mr. Fox claims that Mr. Chatfield has no jurisdiction at all over any theater built to exhibit motion pictures. It is to Chief Egan, of the State police, that Mr. Fox intends to look as far as exits are concerned.

The Shamrock is the name Benjamin Hansdorf has chosen for his new moving picture theater, soon to open on Baldwin street, Waterbury, Conn. The house looks neat and inviting, and has a rather good location. Mr. Hansdorf will manage the Shamrock himself, and promises a good quality of photoplays.

Here is a story that is being told hereabouts: In the little town of Thompsonville, Conn., there are three small moving picture theaters, whose business has decreased as the temperature increased. Two of the houses reduced the admission price to five cents. The third house disdained this way of securing its lost trade and tried a novel scheme of its own. A large notice was posted in the lobby stating that for one week any boy or girl would be admitted free on presentation of fifty dead flies at the box office. The idea is novel and healthful, but the theater can't pay its rent and other expenses with dead flies!

The Opera House, St. John, Canada, a moving picture theater, is closed, and will not reopen until fall. D. H. McDonald, who had been manager of the Opera House, resigned recently to assume control of a new theater that is being opened at Sydney, N. S., by L. R. Acker. Mr. McDonald is very well and favorably known in St. John and he left there with the best wishes of his many friends. Kiernan Kelly will now have charge of the Opera House, which is owned by F. G. Spencer. Mr. Kelly formerly had charge of the Spencer Theater at Amherst, N. S. The new Acker Theater at Sydney, N. S., should be a winner, as Mr. L. R. Acker has a most prosperous theater at Halifax, devoted to pictures, and he has the reputation of being an astute promoter.

Joseph Lajoie, general manager of Sohmer Park, Montreal, Canada, died June 29, at his home. Mr. Lajoie was very widely known in Canadian theatrical circles. Mr. Lajoie's partner, Mr. L. J. Lavigne, died in 1909, and now this concern is no more. Sohmer Park rose to great prosperity under Mr. Lajoie and photoplays were a prominent part of the entertainment of late years.

Mrs. S. Schultz, who controls a string of houses in Maine, states that business is "not at all bad" these hot days. The Perry Theater, Presque Isle, seems to be doing especially well. All the Schultz theaters offer Mutual film service.

Charles E. Cook, manager of the Bijou Theater, Fall River, Mass., has inaugurated a new policy for the hot weather and is now offering stock company attractions, with a reel of moving pictures between each act. Business is only fair at the Bijou just now.

The Opera House, Milford, Mass., is now rapidly nearing completion. A fire-curtain is to be part of the equipment of the Opera House, as Manager Tompkins does not want another fire to put the theater out of commission. September 1 is scheduled as opening day by Mr. Tompkins.

Mr. Felix Wendelschafer, manager of the Opera House, Providence, R. I., has closed his house for the summer.

Bullock's Theater, Providence, R. I., devoted to vaudeville and motion picture programs, has closed for the heated term. Mr. Bullock intends to make extensive alterations and improvements in his theater in order to be ready for the strong competition next fall.

On June 28, Dominion Park, the great resort of Montreal, Canada, was visited by fire, to the extent of $20,000. Dominion Park is the Coney Island of Montreal. However, the damage will be immediately replaced. The moving picture interests of the park were not troubled by the fire.

W. J. Burrows, of London, Canada, has been appointed a delegate to the Theatrical Workers' Union of America for the twenty-first annual convention, to be held in Seattle, Wash. Mr. Burrows was appointed by the London Stage Employees' Union.

K. E. Finlay opened the new Francais Theater, Ottawa, Canada, to the public on June 23. A big bill of vaudeville and pictures is the policy. The house will give four shows daily; two matinee shows and two evening performances. The Francais is reported to be a modern, up-to-date theater and it has a prominent location. Mr. Finlay also manages the Family Theater of Ottawa, also a photoplay and vaudeville house.

On June 27 the single and married employes of Keith's Theater, Boston, played a ball game at the National League grounds. It was a fiercely fought contest and, when the smoke cleared, it was discovered that the single men had won—8 to 7—but it had taken them ten innings to carry off the bacon. Mr. Mel. Moore, pitcher for the single men, was in superb form, and batted hard.

William H. Patten, who has been the outside man for the Boston offices of the Mutual Film Corporation for the past few months, has received due recognition of his ability by his promotion to manager of the Waterville, Me., office of his company. Mr. Patten has the best wishes of the trade in his new duties, as he made many firm friends by his genial personality. Fred. V. Murphy, who had been making such good headway with the Waterville office, has been switched to the Mutual office at Springfield, Mass. Mr. Murphy is a real hustler and it was due, to a great extent at least, to his efforts that the Maine state branch of the Exhibitors' League was organized last week.

The Opera House, Providence, R. I., has contracted to exhibit the "North of 53" films, and it is hoped that such photoplay features as these will enable the theater to remain open over the summer, as the regular road attractions were found to be unable to turn the trick when the hot weather started in.

The Princess Theater, Hartford, Conn., is making a strong effort to attract trade these hot days, and offers photoplays of the grade of "Oliver Twist," "The Wandering Jew" and "The Prisoner of Zenda" as the bait.

His Majesty's Theater, Montreal, Canada, finds business very fair, the weather considered. The recent Derby race was the feature this week, and this topical film attracted much notice, according to reports.

Edison's talking pictures are being featured at the Loomer Opera House, Willimantic, Conn., much to the pleasure of the audiences. The Loomer hopes to be able to remain open this summer, although business is very quiet just now.

The Lawler Theater, Greenfield, Mass., is giving its patrons a big run for its money. Vaudeville acts of the better sort, Kinemacolor service and regular black and white films form the present programs.

The Colonial Theater, Haverhill, Mass., has closed for the season, but expects to reopen the first week in August. This house reports the season just past to have been quite satisfactory.

The Academy of Music, Haverhill, Mass., is now being rebuilt and will have its opening early in the fall. The theater has been leased by Henry Duncan, of New York, who expects to install a local manager instead of looking after the house himself. The policy of the Academy of Music has not yet been decided on.

The Star Theater, Dover, N. H., has closed for the season and extensive alterations and improvements will be made. When the Star reopens it will present an appearance that will be greatly changed, and for the better.

A recent incorporation is the Clinton Amusement Company, of New Hampshire. The company has a capital of $10,000, and is made up of the owners of the Scenic, Globe and Star Theaters, all of Dover, N. H., who have consolidated for mutual good. W. E. Greene has been selected as president of the new company. Mr. Greene, together with his partner, J. H. Woodhead, own the Globe Theater. H. Abrahams, part owner of the Globe, is also a member of the corporation, while Walter J. O'Toole, proprietor of the Star Theater, is treasurer. J. H. Woodhead, of the Globe, will be general manager of the houses. The object of this amalgamation is to avoid competition, and to make business better for all concerned. It is planned to eliminate the vaudeville and photoplay policy at the Star Theater and to inaugurate stock company attractions. In the smaller cities, like Dover, such a scheme as this really "listens well," and the idea will be watched with interest by the trade hereabouts.

The Covered Theater, Central Park, near Dover, N. H., has opened "for the season, and states that business is simply great."

The Opera House at Claremont, N. H., has closed for the season, and will reopen in August with a photoplay and popular vaudeville policy.

The Grand Opera House, London, Canada, found that stock company attractions could not draw in the trade during summer and has changed the policy to photoplays. Lyman Howe's Travel Talks are also offered as a feature. The theater will probably remain open all summer, thanks to motion pictures.

Both the Sherman and Star Theaters, Saskatoon, Canada, moving picture houses, closed several weeks ago for the season.

W. E. Greene, the well known film man of New England, has had good luck in boking "The Dread of Doom" and "The Fatal Grotto," two state right feature pictures, which he controls.

Another recent incorporation is the Clinton Amusement Company. Ten thousand dollars is the company's capital, and Philip J. Philbin, Walter J. O'Toole, Hiram Abrams and Walter E. Greene are the promoters. The two last named are very well known in New England moving picture circles.

Prof. S. Janelli, who is well known to the New England trade, due to his interests in the Majestic Feature Film Exchange, Boston, the Cosmopolitan Theater in Lawrence, Mass., and the Majestic Theater in Haverhill, Mass., has now returned home, after a very extended tour of the Continent. The professor reports that he has picked up a large number of moving picture features during his sojourn, and has some especially fine Italian features. Frank Boschetti is very happy now-a-days, as he was kept busy from morning until night looking after the professor's interests for the last few months. The Majestic Feature Film Exchange will have some real features for release very soon.

Hiram Abrahams, the big moving picture man of Portland, Me., was in New York recently, and has decided to handle the Vivaphone, singing and talking pictures, for New England. There is no man in this territory better able to handle this feature than Mr. Abrahams, who is interested in twenty odd New England theaters, all showing moving pictures. Associated with him in these enterprises is W. E. Greene, formerly the head of the W. E. Greene Film Exchange, which is now the New England Universal Film Exchange. The combination of these two men is a very happy one, and nothing save success seems to crown their efforts.

J. A. Eslow, manager of the Mutual Film Corporation of Massachusetts, with offices at 1106 Boyleston street, Boston, has resigned, and is now succeeded by W. H. Bradley, formerly in charge of the Mutual's office at Washington, D. C. George I. Appleby remains as assistant manager. It appears that Mr. Eslow could not see his way clear to remain with the Mutual people, due to some misunderstanding that came up. New England exhibitors were extremely sorry to see Mr. Eslow leave, who had worked up, not only a very large trade, but who, in so doing, had gained the friendship and loyalty of all his many customers by virtue of his square deal policy. In fact, the Mutual exhibitors were very persistent that Mr. Eslow remain, and signed a petition stating so, which was sent to the home office in New York. Mr. Eslow was gratified at this expression of the exhibitors' regard for him but could not change his decision to leave. After this exhibitors hereabouts felt that Mr. Appleby should take Mr. Eslow's place, as the former is a great favorite with the trade. In fact, it was due to Mr. Appleby's efforts, to a great degree, that the Mutual's Boston office is so busy. However, the home office decided to install Mr. Bradley in charge and it is believed that everything will continue smoothly under his direction, provided the same old square deal policy is continued towards the exhibitors. Mr. Eslow was presented with a very beautiful gold-headed cane, the gift of his office force, as a mark of their appreciation of his fair treatment. Mr. Eslow expects to go to Chicago in the near future.

The new Empire Theater, Winthrop, Mass., is doing a very nice business since its recent opening, and its 800 odd seats are often taxed to their capacity. A good quality of Mutual photoplays is one of the reasons.

Manager Bigley, of the Olympia Theater, Hampton Beach, N. H., reports excellent business at this summer theater. Mr. Bigley is owner, as well as manager, of the Olympia, which is a first class theater, devoted to motion pictures.

Ralph Ward is a mighty busy man these days, as he has full charge of the numerous summer parks operated by the Bay State Street Railway Company. All these parks give moving picture programs and Mr. Ward decided to use Mutual films this season and closed the deal with his old friend, George Appleby, of the Mutual's Boston office. Business has opened up very nicely thus far and Mr. Ward anticipates a good season.

Manager Izzy Greenburg, of the Gem Theater, East Boston, has cut out all the vaudeville acts from his programs and will give straight photoplay shows over the summer. The Congress Theater, of South Boston, has done the same. Both houses are doing very well, the season of the year considered.

Conn's Theater, Concord, N. H., is now giving a combination program of Mutual films and musical comedies. This will be continued over the summer unless business takes a sudden drop. Conn's Theater is the most up-to-date and attractive in Concord and usually does a capacity business.

The Colonial Theater, Nashua, N. H., closed for the season the first part of July. This moving picture and vaudeville house has had a satisfactory year's business, according to reports.

B. F. Keith's new Imperial Theater, King square, St. John, Canada, is now well under way. Mr. Albert E. Westover, who designed this house, together with Mr. Benjamin Cates, inspected the Imperial this week and found everything proceeding smoothly. When completed the Imperial will have a total seating capacity of about 1,800, including the balcony. The house is modern and of strictly fireproof construction. Mr. Walter H. Golding is slated to manage the house, as he has been in charge of the Keith interests in St. John for six years.

Hamilton, Canada, has a new theater called the Royal, which is offering programs of photoplays and illustrated songs. Manager Cairns does not intend to use any vaudeville acts to induce trade. The Royal is a cozy theater, with a prominent location on King West, and should get its share of the trade. Hamilton is reported to be a good town for moving picture theaters, and the Princess, Gaiety, Empire, Savoy, Unique, Red Mill and Airdome Theaters are all bidding for business.

M. Griffin is becoming a very active Canadian exhibitor. At Woodstock, Griffin's Theater does a nice business with bills of motion pictures and vaudeville. Mr. Griffin announces that he has purchased a lot of ground in Woodstock, and intends to build another theater, which will be fireproof and modern in every way. The Griffin company also operates a theater at Stratford.

At Brantford, Canada, Managers Low, Moyer and Symonds of the Gem, Apollo and Colonial Theaters, respectively, report satisfactory business. F. G. Spencer opened his Unique Theater, St. John, Canada, last week. The Unique has an entirely new front and lobby, and is much improved in appearance. Mr. Spencer now intends to close his Lyric Theater, in order to make some improvements and alterations. The new Empire Theater, now building, will be strong competition, which accounts for Mr. Spencer's activity. The Opera House, also a Spencer theater, at St. John, is closed for the season. All these houses show moving picture programs.

John R. Oldfield, the popular manager of the Nickle Theater, Lawrence, Mass., took a short vacation last week. Mr. Oldfield ran over to Fitchburg, Mass., to take part in the one hundred and twelfth anniversary of the Aurora Lodge, A. F. and A. M. Mr. Oldfield is a past master of this organization, and, truth to tell, he is also a pastmaster at the art of conducting a high-class theater, devoted to vaudeville and pictures.

The Massachusetts Realty Company, of Boston, Mass., operates far from its base, as it now expects to build a theater at Sioux City, Ia., which will cost $100,000, including the upper part, which will be made into offices. The new Park Theater at Lake street and Austin avenue, in Austin, was opened June 28. The house is a large one and handsomely decorated. It has an excellent pipe organ. George M. Gatts, manager of the Warrington, will look after the new house. The other new place in which Mr. Gatts is interested, the Playhouse, on South Boulevard, near West avenue in Oak Park, opened July 4. The Playhouse, which seats 650 persons, has adopted a number of ideas from the Hippodrome in London, one of which is a skylight 15 x 30 feet, and which is not covered with anything. A cover operated by an electric motor, slides on and off this opening as ventilation is required. A concrete floor, which may be flushed daily, is another sanitary feature. The indirect lighting system is used. The alleys were paved so that side exits were made practical. The exterior is of tapestry brick and tile. KINEMACOLOR ADOPTS SIMPLEX PROJECTORS

R. G. HOLLAMAN, Esq.
Eden Musee, W. 23rd St., New York City

Dear Sir:

In confirmation of our conversation of this afternoon, I hereby wish to place an initial order for 100 Simplex machines at the price quoted in Mr. Cannock's letter to me under date of June 25th, with the understanding that you include color reversal attachment which has been omitted in your quotation.

We intend to adopt your machine exclusively for use in Kinemacolor projection all over the world.

Thanking you for past favors, and trusting that I may see you again before I leave for Europe, I beg to remain,

Very truly yours,

(Signed) W. H. HICKEY, General Manager,
NATURAL COLOR KINEMATOGRAPH COMPANY, Limited
LONDON, ENGLAND

EXHAUSTIVE tests prove that Simplex projectors are the best of all American and European made machines for Kinemacolor projection. When run at normal speed 32 pictures are projected every second as compared with 16 pictures per second of the ordinary kind. This double strain, wear and tear is successfully withstood by Simplex, the peerless projector. Another wonderful achievement is the fact that Kinemacolor pictures can now be successfully projected with 35 amperes D. C., where 70 amperes D. C. were formerly required.

When the world's greatest motion picture projector is available for your use, why be satisfied with anything else?

We have unfilled orders now for over 300 machines, and this is supposed to be the dull season. Don't hesitate. Act today. Catalogue A fully describes the Simplex.

LICENSED FILM STORIES

KALEM.

THE FLYING SWITCH (July 28).—James Burns, treasurer of the foundry, finds himself in financial straits and determines to secure the money for the payroll that is due on the two o'clock express. He informs two shady characters of his plan and they promise to aid him. One of the men boards the train when he sees the express messenger receive the money. Frank Kearney, the messenger, is in love with Helen, the Glen Road Station Agent's daughter.

Burns and the other accomplice take an automobile and ride to a small junction near Glen Road. They overpower the operator and bind him in his chair. Helen has relieved her father and suddenly hears a call for help coming in over the wire. The junction operator has managed to move his chair to the table and is operating the instrument with his chin. Without an instant's hesitation the brave girl boards a motor repair car and rides to the rescue.

As the express nears the junction Burns' confederate uncouples the express car from the rest of the train. The train thunders on and Burns quickly throws the switch, causing the express car to run in on a siding. Kearney is overpowered and the robbers flee in the automobile with their loot. Helen's car rushes toward the train and she slows down just in time to avert a collision. They quickly back to the junction and find the injured messenger. The robbers have been detained on a country road. An engine is sent in pursuit, and after a thrilling chase the criminals come to a tragic end.

BIRDS OF PREY (July 30).—When Jim, a young workman, is approached by two of his former companions, who propose a shady transaction, he informs them that he is now a father and that his son is going to have a clean name.

The doctor warns Jim that unless his wife is sent West there is little hope for her recovery. He writes his old mother, who gladly sends all of her savings, now that Jim is leading an honest life.

As Jim is cashing the draft he is seen by a stool pigeon, who goes to a crooked private detective with a proposition. A nefarious scheme to secure Jim's money is put in execution. The two men visit a pawnbroker, who is a notorious fence and by threats secure several stolen articles which are "planted" in Jim's house.

When Jim is arrested, Murphy, the detective, recommends that he engage Sloane, a "shyster lawyer," who has been made a party to the plot. Jim refuses, but Sloane visits the wife, who turns over the money that Jim may have a fair trial.

The money is divided among the three schemers and the trial is held. To the amazement of the plotters the pawnbroker settles an old score by exposing the plot. Jim, liberated, hastens home and learns the situation from his wife. Infuriated, he seeks the lawyer's life, but an unexpected incident stays his hand and Sloane makes restitution.

HOODOOED ON HIS WEDDING DAY (August 1).—Under the terms of his uncles' will, Harvey is to receive a large fortune, provided he is married within three days after the notification. His sweetheart, Isabel, is quite willing that the marriage take place at once. They secure the license and arrange for the ceremony on the following day.

When it is time for the marriage at Isabel's house, Harvey discovers he has left the license at home and returns for it. Meanwhile, Isabel's cook has taken sick and the doctor, declaring the case to be smallpox, puts the house under quarantine.

When Harvey comes back he is not permitted to enter and resorts to numerous schemes which lead to his arrest. Finally the doctor announces that he has been mistaken and as the quarantine is lifted, Isabel liberates the prospective bridegroom.

THE WONDERS OF THE BRINY DEEP (August 1).—Through the courtesy of the New York Zoological Society this most remarkable production has been made, showing odd sea creatures in their native habitat. We see the Seahorse, Spadefish, Cowfish, Trunkfish, Black Sea-Bass, Nassau Grouper, Filefish, Boxfish, Trigger Fish, Red Grouper, Sea Raven, White Grunt, Yellow-in Grouper, Porkfish, Spotted Moray, Angelfish, Red Hogfish, Rock Hind, Squirrel Fish, Red Wing, Sea Robin and Swellfish.

A VIRGINIA FEUD (August 2).—When Rose McDonald and Frank Mosby became engaged it appears that the deadly feud which has long existed between the families has come to an end. The betrothal is held at the McDonald cabin. All seem willing to forget past differences save McDonald, the bride's father and Joe, the groom's young brother.

The day of the wedding arrives. Frank prevails upon the family to leave all weapons at home. He sends them ahead. Joe has informed Frank that he no longer regards him as a brother.

It happens that Joe, while hunting, accidentally shoots his little sister. Frank on the way to the wedding discovers the little one's plight and takes her home, sending Joe to the McDonald cabin with an explanation. But Joe does not go, although he comes back and tells Frank that he has carried the word.

The guests become impatient. Old McDonald is not at all hospitable and contends that Frank does not expect to marry the daughter. One unfortunate incident follows another and the old feud is about to be renewed when the bridegroom learns of his brother's treachery and carries the wounded little one to the McDonald cabin. He arrives amidst a hot battle and, ending hostilities, takes his place by Rose's side while the minister performs the belated ceremony.

ECLIPSE.

A STATUE OF FRIGHT (Special—2 parts—July 11).—The sculptor, Homer Sargent, obliged to go abroad, entrusts the care of his beautiful daughter, Flora, to his old friend, Dr. Townsend. On the departure of Sargent, the doctor and his charge go to the seaside to pass the intervening weeks. One day while rowing, Flora loses an oar. Helpless, at the mercy of the waves, she is rescued by Robert Montenay, a wealthy young man spending his holiday at the seaside. From this incident, acquaintance ripens into love—genuine love on the part of Flora, but a mere passing infatuation with Robert. He soon tires of her and departs for home, leaving a farewell note behind him. This, Flora receives, and with a breaking heart, goes home with Dr. Townsend.

On his return, Sargent is struck with the melancholy beauty of his daughter's face and induces her to be the model for his new work. He completes his statue and calls it "Melancholy." Meanwhile Flora's health fails and she returns to die where she had loved. The broken-hearted sculptor and his friend make frantic search, finding her at the little sea-side resort, her cold fingers clutching Robert's farewell note. Sargent is inconsolable and the body is embalmed and taken home. Just at this time Robert Montenay becomes engaged to a famous beauty and with her one day visits the studio of Sargent. He is instantly struck with the wonderful statue and offers to buy it. Sargent refuses. Robert hands him his card and Sargent recognizes the name signed to the farewell note which Flora held when they found her. The thought of vengeance almost stifles him. He hastily agrees to exhibit the statue at the prenuptial dinner on the 'morrow. Sargent takes the dead body of his daughter to the home of Robert's fiancée. Amid a blaze of light, surrounded by scores of friends, the supposed statue is placed upon a divan. Then when Sargent holds the breathless attention of his audience, he suddenly tears the covering from the body of Flora, at the same time publicly denouncing the false Montenay. Covered with shame and horror, Robert flies from the room. Thus does Sargent obtain his revenge.

ESSANAY.

THE CALL OF THE PLAINS (July 29).—Bud Wheeler proposes to Jane Barton, who, because her father is an old, old man, tells him that she cannot marry just yet. Bud, thinking that it is not the real reason, goes West. Later, Jane sends Bud a letter telling him that she does love him, but the letter, through a trick of fate, is lost and remains so for twelve years. At last the letter is found, and with a heart overbrimming with love, Bud sends for her. And there, in the bosom of the West, are laid the final scenes of a beautiful love story that will linger long in the mind.

BREAD UPON THE WATERS (July 30).—Phil Raine rescues a little girl, Esther, from a brutal father. His wife will not bear to having the child, so he takes her to his old nurse. Later, Raine's wife deserts him and he sinks to the depths. Some years afterwards, broken and destitute, he returns to the home of his old nurse, and there sees Esther, now a grown girl. All the time she has worshipped him as "her hero," and, through a serious illness which Raine suffers, they are brought together. The doors of a new life open for them both. "The bread returned."

TIT FOR TAT (July 31).—The women haters are attracted by the chatter of the two roomers, who, never seeing the men, are naturally curious as to their looks. Under pretext of borrowing salt, one of the girls goes to the door, and there is greeted by the face of one of the men, disguised as a negro. Indignant, the girls complain to the landlady, who says she will make the men apologize. The girls, in their turn, play a joke on the men. When the negro girls come with their washing, they are made to take their place, and, when the men come to apologize, they are greeted by two buxom negro women. At last, all meet in the parlor and after explanations, the men are women haters no longer.

THROUGH THE CUMBERLAND MOUNTAINS, TENN. (July 31).—In this beautiful little reel the spectator is taken on a wonderful trip through the Cumberland Mountains, in the cab of a locomotive, and also views the marvelous scenic grandeur as though looking from the running board of a swiftly flying engine, dashing in and out of tunnels and fine panoramic glimpses from lofty trestles that span the Chattanooga River. Hundreds of tourists take this trip each summer and the picture, photographed in this novel way, should please both young and old.

SUCH IS LIFE (August 1).—Mr. Busyman is always in a hurry and always scheming to economize. On the contrary, his wife is inclined to be a woman of expensive tastes. Their different actions show us a touch of things as they are, and at the same time furnish many a hearty laugh.

HIS WIFE'S FRIENDS (August 1).—On their wedding anniversary, Mr. Carson plans to surprise his wife with theater tickets for that evening. Mrs. Carson informs her husband that it will be impossible for them to attend the theater as she has invited Mr. and Mrs. Kent to dinner. Mrs. Carson gives the tickets to Mrs. Smith, who in turn gives them to Mrs. Kent. The way in which the tickets change hands is the basis of an excruciatingly humorous comedy.

THE TENDERFOOT SHERIFF (August 2).—Snake, a notorious outlaw, robs the general store. True Boardman, the sheriff, and a posse starts out after him. Snake riddles the sheriff's hat with bullets and the sheriff and posse run under cover. Boardman resigns. The village trustees appoint a new sheriff. Snake writes a note saying he will be in Kelly's saloon that night. Then he goes to the sheriff's office, handcuffs him and takes his gun away from him. The new sheriff also resigns. The trustees place a notice in the general store, increasing the reward $1,000. Broncho Billy, out of work, captures the outlaw and the reward by a clever ruse.

LUBIN.

THE WIDOW'S WILES (July 28).—John Scott and Henry Carlton are old cronies, and it is their delight that young Jack Scott and Mamie Carlton are to be married some day. The Widow Bruce comes to town and both Scott and Carlton become infatuated. In their rivalry they forbid Jack and Mamie to marry. The widow discovers the trouble and has Jack make love to her. Carlton and Scott see and each withdraws his objection to the marriage of Mamie and Jack, thinking by this means to get rid of their younger rival. But Mamie has seen Jack's love making, too, and the widow has to square Jack there. This she does and when Scott and Carlton find out, they race for the widow's house, only to find that she has just become engaged to a younger man.

RASTUS AMONG THE ZULUS (July 28).—Rastus Johnson, a happy-go-lucky coon, after eating a large meal, lies down on the dock to take a nap. While he is slumbering three roughs happen along and see him, and knowing a sea captain who is in need of men to fill out his crew, they seize Rastus and shanghai him. He is placed aboard the ship and the voyage started. The vessel is wrecked off the African coast, and poor Rastus is the only survivor. While wandering along the beach he is seen by the Zulus, who immediately give chase. Rastus runs through the jungle, but is compelled to give up. They capture him and take him before their king, who orders him to be cooked. One of the women of the tribe, who happens to be present when Rastus is brought in, knowing the king's daughter is ambitious to be married to some man outside of her own tribe, runs off to tell her of the captive. Rastus is led to the royal kitchen, where the cook pot is prepared. They are just about to thrust him in, when the daughter pleads with her father for Rastus' life. This he grants on one condition, that Rastus must marry the daughter. This he tells to Rastus, and Rastus, after a good look at the daughter, decides to take to the cook pot. This enrages the king so that he orders Rastus to be seized and given a sound beating. They seize him and throw him on the ground and commence. They beat him so hard that he wakes up to find a policeman tapping him with his club. The blue coat orders Rastus to move on his way, which he does, little the worse for his terrible dream.

THE CALL OF HER HEART (July 29).—Paul Shields, a young minister, is in love with the pretty school teacher, Mary Holmes, who doesn't encourage him. Calling for her at the close of school, she is pleased to accompany him to a prayer meeting on board a ship. The minister preaches to the men as Jack Ames, the first mate, and Mary walk off on a tour of the ship. A week elapses and the friendship of Ames and Mary has ripened into love. A party is given the minister and Mary enters with Ames, presenting a bunch of flowers. They leave the parsonage and Ames proposes. Mary agrees and they return to the minister. The request she makes is like a death blow. Stopping all merriment, he performs the ceremony. As everybody leaves he reels in his chair.

A year later, Ames, having grown tired of life on land, secures a position as mate on a turpentine carrier. He tells his wife of his plans: she hesitates at first on account of their baby, but after a little persuasion by Ames, she agrees, as he has had little success on land. Shortly after an explosion occurs on board and the ship is enveloped in flames. Mrs. Ames, who has become uneasy at home, is at the water's edge looking out to sea. She sees the ship afire. A second terrific explosion happens, killing all on board.

The following day the minister calls upon Mrs. Ames and gently tells her of her husband's death. The following morning she begins to realize her lonely position in life, and looking through the "Want Ads," reads of a position as companion to a wealthy woman to travel abroad. Lost as to what to do with her baby, she thinks of her friend, the minister. Writing a note that her baby is in the way to her livelihood, and for him to take care of it, she pins the note to the baby's dress and carrys it to the door of the minister's home. His spinster sister discovers the baby and takes it into her brother's study. Seeing the note they read it. The minister decides to keep the baby. Mrs. Ames, who has witnessed this action from a window outside, leaves with a light heart. Applying for the position she is engaged and leaves for Europe. Five years have elapsed and Mrs. Ames, changed in her stylish attire, calls at the parsonage. The minister's sister fails to recognize her, but goes to her brother and tells him of the woman waiting him. Entering, he is surprised to meet no other than Mary, who immediately asks about her child. The minister realizes he is about to lose his companion, and refuses to give her up. Turning upon him in rage, she demands her baby, at which the minister retorts. She may have her child if she can identify her in the Sunday School. Scanning each baby face in the class of children, Mrs. Ames fails to recognize her child and returning to the parsonage, leaves heart broken. The minister returns to his class and dismisses the children. Mrs. Ames, who is seated on a bench near the church sobbing, is noticed by two of the Sunday School children, who, in sympathy, come to her. Mary asks one her name and the child is quickly clasped in her mother's embrace. The scene is witnessed by the minister, who comes to them, and, blessing both, goes to his study, where he kneels in prayer of thanks.

A DASH FOR LIBERTY (Special—2 parts—July 30).—John Field, head bookkeeper of the First National Bank, and in charge of the safe deposit vaults, was rather a rapid young man. His associates of a like calibre, have given him evil suggestions, and he, acting upon them, steals, not only from the bank funds, but from the deposit boxes, of which he secures duplicate keys. He attempts to cover up his irregularities, but it is found out by an old German customer who has a safe deposit box. He informs the president of the bank, who immediately sets the wheels of the law in motion to find out the defaulter. He secures Mary Ryan, an expert detective, who "ropes" the impressionable young man, and he, fascinated by her, informs her that he is leaving, that evening, and asks her to come with him. She agrees. They part to prepare for the journey. She immediately informs the bank president, who secures two plain clothes men. Field, coming to the station, sees them talking, takes alarm and seeing another engine standing on a siding, determines to make his getaway. In his youth his father was an engineer, and he learned how to run an engine. The female detective and the two plain clothes men, with the assistance of the bank president, give chase after discovering his departure and capture him. The feminine in the girl detective asserts itself after a strenuous jump from the engine and she realizes that she is going to faint, but first locks one handcuff on the captive and one on herself, and immediately afterwards falls unconscious. Field, the culprit, who has been knocked unconscious, regains his senses and realizes the situation. He carries the girl with him to what he deems a place of safety, but is overtaken by the plain clothes men and the banker, where womanlike, she comes to long enough to inform the bank president that she guesses she fainted, but she got him. The bank president, whose admiration had previously been strongly augmented, now shows his love for the girl and clasps her in his arms.

THE FATAL SCAR (July 31).—Ferro Cararo, a Mexican pagan in the hills of Mexico, has abducted two children in their youth and taught the older one to become a highwayman. Carlos, the older boy, a gentleman by birth, rebels against this life and at last determines to desert the old brigand. He divides his spoils with his teacher and departs for the States, taking his younger brother with him. Ten years later we find him well established in the community, having gained recognition by honesty and straightforwardness. He meets a beautiful girl through an accident to her brother. They become sweethearts. Ferro, the Mexican, finding it too hot for him in his native home, also departs for the States. An incident brings the teacher and the slave children together. Ferro recognizes the scar which he himself had made upon the wrist of Carlos. Ferro, fearing he would be recognized, determines to give Carlos up to the authorities, and inveigles the sheriff into running Carlos down and shooting him as a murderer and desperado. His sweetheart feeling something is wrong, arrives in time to take charge of the little brother as she sees her sweetheart dying.

THE NEW GOWN (August 1).—Nathan Biddle cannot understand the little whims of woman's vanity, or realize why his wife needs new gowns so often. The question of a new one comes up and Elsie, the wife, tells Nathan that she needs it badly. She even shows him the gowns she has been wearing for the past year. Nathan looks them over, and seeing no worn spots, concludes that they are still good, and refuses the request. Elsie gives up in disgust and writes her mother for advice. Her mother writes her that men are the same the world over, Elsie's father being the same. She concludes by telling her to be patient and enclosing money for a new gown as a present. That her mother should have to send her money to buy gowns that her husband should provide, galls Elsie, and she resolves that she will not make use of the money her mother has sent. On that morning, however, Nathan tells her that he will bring home Mr. and Mrs. Kirk with him to dinner, and to be sure and look her prettiest. How could she look her prettiest in gowns the Kirks have seen so often? Then it is that she remembers her mother's letter, and resolves to use the money. She makes a quick reply to Nathan's refusal, that "there is another who will buy it for her then," and Nathan gasps in amazement, and fiercely demands to know what she means; but Elsie will not say anything more and Nathan laughs at the absurdity of doubting her. After he has gone she goes downtown and buys the gown her heart is set upon, so that when Nathan and his guests arrive, she gains the admiration of the Kirks and her husband's displeasure. After the guests have left Nathan gives away to the suspicion and doubt he has held back and demands to know where she got the new gown. Elsie, seeing an opportunity to tease him, makes the most of it, and Nathan, losing his temper, makes an accusation against her. That he should dare to doubt her hurts worse than anything else and she concludes that there is but one thing to do—leave him. When she is leaving he again pleads to be informed, but she turns from him and in his hot temper he tells her to go and never see him again. Later he begins to realize that he was wrong. He goes to her room, finds the mother's letter and he hastens to Elsie with a penitent heart and receives the blessing of her forgiveness.

THE MESSAGE OF THE ROSE (August 2).—Alonzo, the timid, loves Ghula, a beautiful senorita of sunny Mexico. Enraptured by her charms, and not bold enough to personally declare his passion, he sends her a white and red rose, requesting that she wear the red rose that night if she returns his love, but if her heart belongs to another, to wear the white. Unconscious of his friend, Manuel, whose passion for Ghula is supreme, he intrusts him with the message and the roses. Manuel, seeing an opportunity to be rid of his rival, withholds the message and the red rose, giving Ghula the white rose to wear. That night, at the garden fete, Alonzo, seeing that Ghula wears the white rose, accepts it as his dismissal. The next day Ghula receives a message which she cannot understand, saying that Alonzo, since she could not give him her love, has given his life to the cause of the revolution, and when Manuel asks her to be his wife, she tells him her heart belongs to the one who has gone. Manuel's first impulse is to confess his duplicity, but realizing it is too late, he leaves to join his command in the Federal army, with his secret undisclosed. As the months go by, Ghula despairs of her lover's return and seeks solace in a convent. Taken as a prisoner of war by Manuel's regiment, Alonzo, along with other prisoners, participate in a lottery of death, wherein those who drew black beans are condemned to die and those who draw white ones are liberated. Drawing the black bean, Alonzo is condemned to death, when Manuel, thinking to right the past wrong, sacrifices his career in liberating him, and asking forgiveness, confesses his perfidy and expiates his crime by being courtmartialed and executed. On his return, Alonzo's dream of love is shattered when he finds that Ghula has consecrated her life to the church, his only possession being the message conveyed by the rose from the hand of his lost love.

VITAGRAPH.

DR. CRATHERN'S EXPERIMENT (July 28).—Being a man of wealth, Dr. Crathern, deformed from birth, spends most of his time going among the poor and administering all the aid possible. On one occasion he is attracted by a cry from a poor tenement and upon investigating learns that Hope, a poor blind girl, and the niece of Mrs. Marly, is being cruelly beaten by her. He intercedes in her behalf and proposes to the woman that he will be the legal guardian of the child. She agrees and after the legal formalities have been attended to, Hope is taken to the doctor's home and placed in the care of his housekeeper. Later she is sent away to a school for the blind, and after spending two years at this institution, she returns home, grown to a beautiful womanhood.

Believing that she will never see his deformity, Dr. Crathern proposes to her and is accepted. The wedding day has been set; but their plans are sadly interrupted by the appearance of a friend of the doctor's, an eye specialist, who, after examining Hope's eyes, makes the startling discovery that there is a possibility of restoring her sight. An operation is performed and it is successful. When she asks for Dr. Crathern she is informed that he went away, for fear that she would not love him when she sees his hideous deformity. Learning of his address she tells him that she would rather be blind than to live without him and requests him to return immediately. He does, and instead of turning away in disgust, as he thought she would, she runs into his arms.

TROUBLESOME DAUGHTERS (July 29).—Ruth Marsh tells her brother, Mark, that he will not be able to manage his daughters when they come home from school, but he only laughs at her. The girls arrive and as a matter of fact they are rather timid and afraid of him. Things are getting along nicely. One day Mark, while out riding, discovers his daughters with their sweethearts. He invites the boys home and one of the girls begins to play the piano. Mark falls asleep, and taking advantage of the opportunity, the young people go into the garden, where they spoon to their hearts' content. Mark wakes up and drives the boys from the premises, with an injunction never to come near the house again. Before he goes on a business trip, Mark writes his sister to come and take care of the girls, as he is unable to manage them. Although the young ladies are afraid of their aunt, they soon observe that she is much less a termagent than their father. One day the aunt catches the girls with their sweethearts, and perceiving that they are nice fellows, invites them to dinner the next day. Whereupon the girls soon learn that their aunt is the dearest soul in the world.

A year later Bill Williams returns again to the town and gets into a poker game. One of the men detects him cheating and accuses him of it. Bill draws his gun and shoots down his accuser. Then, covering his retreat with his gun, gets out, and mounting his horse, rides out of town. The boys quickly form a posse and follow him. Bill manages to elude them by getting off his horse and climbing a tree. He then makes tracks across the country to a shack he sees in the distance. When he gets there he finds the shack to be that of Ruth and Jim, who is at that moment sleeping. Ruth tells him to go at once before Jim hears him or he will surely be killed. Jim, however, wakes and enters the room. He reminds Bill of the oath that he has taken to kill him and tells him that when the clock strikes he will fire. Ruth goes back into the bedroom and secures another of her husband's revolvers, and just as Jim is about to fire at Bill, she shoots Jim in the wrist, causing him to drop his gun. Taking possession of the weapon he has dropped, Ruth bandages her husband's arm, explaining that she shot at him to save her baby from becoming the child of a murderer. At this moment the posse rides up to the house and leads Bill away as a prisoner, that the law may take care of him.

WHEN SOCIETY CALLS (July 31).—Because her husband always has nightly engagements, Mrs. Bentley, in conversation with her friends, is advised to go and do likewise. This causes a separation between the couple, and a provision in the legal instrument calls for the abode of their child to be six months with the mother and the other six months of the year with the father. After living six months with her mother, Grace, the little girl, is glad to get away, for she has been out mostly every night and has not given her any care. But the child soon learns that her father is living the same life, and when she is taken suddenly ill and father and mother meet at the bedside, she sends them both away because they have not treated her right. She likes her paralytic grandfather. The parents, who have been outside, are attracted to the room by a loud groan from the old man and in the presence of her parents, grandfather and nurse, the little girl passes away. Through the invisible power coming from the old man's eye, father and mother, realizing that they have done wrong, are reunited.

COURAGE OF THE COMMONPLACE (August 1).—While ploughing his fields one day, John Cameron, a farmer, notices that his horse, Jerry, is evidently sick, so stops work and takes the team up to the barn. He looses Jerry and lets him go into a loose box, while the other horse, Jim, is put, as usual, into his stall. Cameron finds that the horse is in bad shape, and at once sets off to see a veterinary surgeon, who gives him medicine for the animal, but does not come to see what is the matter.

That same morning, Julia, his daughter, receives a reply from the principal of the School of Arts and Sciences to a letter she has written him asking the cost of a course she wishes to take. She has long hoped to get something better than a college education, and has been saving all the money she could make on her chickens in order to be able to afford it. Her elder sister, Bessie, who is rather of a frivolous disposition, already attends the school, but her parents, who have besides the two girls, several other younger children, cannot afford to send Julia as well. It is at the cost of much hard work and self denial that Julia has been able to save at all and she is now overjoyed to find that she has just enough to put her through.

That night the horse dies. Cameron is in despair, for Jim, Jerry's team-mate, is an old horse and is not strong enough to plough alone. Unless Cameron is able to get his seed into the ground and reap the harvest, he will be unable to meet the payment on the mortgage, due in the fall. Both he and his wife are greatly distressed, for it looks as if their work of years in improving the farm will all be wasted. Knowing this, Julia decides to forego her college course and offer them the money so that a new horse may be bought. This course is indeed difficult for her for she has long dreamed of what her new life would be. The sight of her frivolous sister, who does not seem to realize what opportunities she has, only makes it harder for her to bear. At first her father will not accept the money, knowing of the dream of his daughter's heart, but at length she persuades him to do so, all the time wearing a smiling face as though it means nothing to her. Truly it is such commonplace sacrifices as these that demand the highest courage.

THE INTRUDER (Special—2 parts—August 2).—Part One—Gilbert Gray, already a wealthy man, inherits a small estate from his uncle. A farm on the estate is occupied by Henry Pendragon, a poverty-stricken old gentleman who has lived there for years rent free. He is much distressed when he hears that Gray is to visit the manor house, fearing that he may be dispossessed of the farm which he has come to regard as his own.

Nancy, his niece, who has lived with him since his son William's departure to seek his fortune in the Klondike, and who practically supports the family by the sale of her paintings, consents, at the suggestion of her proud old uncle, to play the part of maid, in order to conceal from Gray their extreme poverty.

Gray is much struck by the appearance of the pretty "maid," who admits him to the house, and after seeing her a few times he finds himself falling in love with her. The discovery of the state of his feelings causes him to decide to return to the city, as he is in no mind to marry a mere servant girl.

Part Two—William Pendragon returns from the Klondike penniless, and stays for a while with some disreputable companions in the city. He is seen there by Gray, who saves his life in a brawl over cards. The young man at length picks up courage enough to go home with his confession of failure and starts off on foot. Young Pendragon goes to the village inn and asks help of the innkeeper, Barker, who sends for his cousin, Nancy.

Meanwhile, Gray, unable to forget the "maid," has returned to the manor, intending to court her and win her for his wife. He sees Nancy enter the inn, and imagines that she is in love with Barker.

Following her one day, Gray meets William again, who tells him of Nancy's real identity. Without letting her know of his discovery, Gray seeks her out and wins her consent to be his wife, to the great delight of old Pendragon, who persuades himself that the whole affair had been brought about by his clever diplomacy.

THE NE'ER TO RETURN ROAD (Special—2 parts—July 19).—Becoming dissatisfied with his quiet old country home, Henry Clark, who has achieved the degree of mining engineer, goes to a mining town, where he soon becomes infatuated with Mrs. Chris Hanson. Their clandestine meetings begin to pall the woman and they later advertise themselves by being together in a dance hall. Hanson, who has returned home unexpectedly, discovers that his wife has gone and traces her to the delectable place of the dance. Explanations are unsatisfactory and Hanson kills the young engineer. Probably through the "unwritten law," Hanson was not executed, but he was sent to the penitentiary for life and the unfaithful wife drifts out with the tide of oblivion. The news of her son's death prostrates Mrs. Clark and she lives with a desire to be avenged.

Several years later Chris. Hanson and others manage to escape from jail, and after shifting around from place to place for several days with hardly anything to eat or drink, Hanson, who had been able to evade his pursuers, falls exhausted at the feet of the gray-haired mother of the murdered boy. Observing from his dress that he is a fugitive, she covers him with the gun left her by her husband before he joined the posse in search of the escaped jailbirds. The wretched condition of the convict excites her pity and, bringing down her rifle, she goes into the house for food. This brings the man to a sense of gratitude and as he is eating he sobs out his story. It then dawns upon Mrs. Clark that the murderer of her son lies at her feet and she again raises her rifle, but again she lowers it. In answer to Mrs. Clark's question as to why she is unable to kill him, the fugitive replies: "Because I told you of my mother in far away Sweden, or perhaps you have a son of your own." The motherly instinct dominates and she aids the man to escape to his native land—Sweden—before her husband and posse return.

THE STOLEN FACE (July 28).—A beautiful cabinet of carved teak, inlaid with ebony and ivory, and ornate with chiseled gold, used as ormulu—a real museum piece, an object d'art, one of the finest and rarest ever imported from the Flowery Kingdom—serves as the crux, about which is cleverly woven a story of originality—aromatic and instinct with that subtle sense of danger ever lurking in Occidental mysteries—is the new picture play, "The Stolen Face." Nothing is sacred from the profaning hand of the vandalistic tourist, and when Gray, an American artist, strays into the Temple of the God of Mercy, he covets the masking face of its beautifully lacquered idols. general, who has been privileged to photograph this sacred symbol before departing to the wars, leaves his kodak in the temple while he goes out to get a tripod. Gray sees a chance to enter the edifice unobserved, goes in and takes the face from the idol. In his pilfering he steps upon the bulb operating the shutter of the photographic instrument and is unconsciously pictured.

The priests, discovering the loss of their sacred care, invest three young men as avengers to restore it. The general puts a print of the picture in the secret drawer of his cabinet, and then accidentally breaks the original plate. Eventually this cabinet becomes the property of a United States senator, whose daughter is wooed by Artist Gray. The avengers locate the cabinet and try to secure the photograph. The artist senses danger and tries to burn his now hideous and imminently tragic trophy. The girl finds the idol's face and he gladly gives it to her. She next finds the picture in the cabinet which shows her suitor as the thief. She dismisses him as altogether unworthy and restores the idol's face to the Japanese ambassador, indicating that she found it in a curio shop, which saves the cowardly but humiliated Gray from the yellow avengers.

HENRIETTA'S HAIR (July 29).—Husky Dan Keough, a button factory worker, is smitten with Lena Helmstaedter, a shy girl who works next to him, on account of her beautiful hair. This piques the scheming Henrietta Hendershot, who is anxious to get Dan for her company. She goes to a hair-store, and lays in Mary Garden coronets, Eames braids, May Irwin Bondinlets, and a lot of wavy puffs. This transforms her into a hirsute Hebe and catches the eye of the honest Dan. He deserts the loyal and loving Lena and takes up with the haughty, flirty Henrietta. The latter fails to pay for all her new headgear, and is sued for damages by the hair-dealer, as she not only did not pay for the "glory," but spitefully declared "the red was fading into dirty green." In court she is compelled to take off her hair in evidence, and Dan, who is present (unknown to her), is horrified to see the profusion of idolized hair reduced to a whispy nubbin. Henrietta is compelled to settle and Dan goes back to nature, or, rather, the lovely Lena, whose hair is only one of her beauties.

BORROWING TROUBLE (July 29).—Tom Harding and his chum, Dick Woods, lolling at ease in the smoking room of their club, recall the fact that they are both due at a masquerade party to be given by the mother of his fiancée. As time is pressing, they have no opportunity to get even dominoes, but hustle into conventional evening dress. Close to the entrance of the ballroom they are accosted by two hoboes, and it inspires Tom with a highly original and aromatic idea. He hustles the tramps to the club, exchanges clothes with them, and gives them the freedom of the club. The tramps, after enjoying their smokes, like monkeys, search their pockets. Finding the invitations to the ball, they decide to take advantage of their clothes and the credentials; so Tom and Dick are refused admission, as they are odoriferous and have no tickets, whereas when the hoboes come they are welcomed. Finally, Tom and Dick get in, and the comedy complications amplify with amusing rapidity. The conclusion is as ridiculous as it is satisfying.

THE TAMING OF TEXAS PETE (July 30).—Texas Pete, a gun-man, is "extra" bad when in liquor. This, however, does not terrify the ranch foreman, who discharges him for drunkenness. Pete laces on his hardware and lurches off, with the intention of shooting up the town where he pumped in his original trouble. On his way he comes across Baby Betty, the imperious pride of the ranch, who has strayed from home and is lost. She demands that he give her his gun, and he obeys her childish caprice. Then she orders him to take her home, and he obediently leads the way for further orders. When they arrive at the ranch she tells her father, the owner, that Pete is a real man and must be given work. The interest and astuteness of the child, tenders the tough westerner and changes him, so that he cuts out the liquor, and becomes a man again. When Baby Betty is abducted by a half-breed as revenge for some fancied wrong, Pete takes the trail like a blood hound, and rounds up the sneaking villain after a desperate fight. He returns the little girl to her parents, showing gratitude for his own reclamation as a respectable member of society.

MAN AND HIS OTHER SELF (July 31).—Jack Barnes, a young business man, reckoned as "a live wire" in the ranks of the Smart Set, is unfortunately addicted to the questionable pleasures of a great city. He holds a mortgage on Farmer Vale's property and he thinks seriously of foreclosing, but decides to run out in his auto and talk it over before acting. He stops by the district schoolhouse where Mary Vale is the teacher, asking directions as to the farm. Without revealing her identity, she gives him the information, and he is at once much attracted by her. At the farm, Barnes is so severely injured by a vicious stallion that he is put to bed at the farm-house. Mary, the daughter, whom he met at the school, volunteers to be his nurse. The presence of this fine, pure girl acts like a tonic and a benediction, and makes a deep impression upon the man's character. Eventually he returns to the city and the old, fast friends flock about him, magnifying temptations. Then begins the struggle between his mean former self, and the higher power that has been aroused within him. The two selves are shown arguing it out with him in the same room, and finally the better part triumphs, the meaner succumbs. He abandons his old, bad ways, looks toward the sunlight and goes forth into the pure air of the country to claim Mary Vale as his wife.

THROUGH ANOTHER MAN'S EYES (August 1).—Tom Norton is a lovable young fellow, but has a weakness for drink that eventually leads to his ruin. He is in love with Eunice Baily, who cares for him and does her best to break the fetters of a habit that becomes a vice. He has a friend, Wallace Elder, who secretly loves Eunice, but who lacks the personality of the dashing drinker, Tom. When they are passing down the street, Tom staggering along with his assistance, he tries to conceal the plight of the former when they meet Eunice. The sharp-eyed young woman sees the pair and has a better chance than ever to compare them. Wallace has an opportunity to recommend Tom for a position as night watchman in his uncle's factory. Tom accepts the situation, but burglars, hearing of his weakness, manage to get him drunk and then rob the office. The fruit of his folly manifolds itself to his befuddled senses, when he finds the safe blown open and the office littered with wreckage. Eunice sends his ring back and advises him to try life in a new city. He goes West and is implicated in a robbery, for which he serves time. His poor old mother lives to welcome him back home after five years. He finds things changed, as he determines to face about in life. He looks through the window of Wallace Elder's home, and the scene that reveals itself indicates what might have been for him—so he looks longingly into happiness through another man's eyes.

MELIES.

IT HAPPENED IN JAVA (July 31).—Aunt Mary is a distinguished archoeologist from America, visiting the ruined temples of Boro-Budur, on the island of Java, Dutch East Indies. She is accompanied by her two nephews, College boys. After passing the customs inspection, they proceed to a hotel, where the manager receives a telegram advising him to pay special attention to the woman and her two young companions. The telegram is misinterpreted and the police are called in on the case.

Fearing that their study may be interrupted, Aunt Mary and her nephews hurry to the ruins with the manager and the police hot on their trail. They make an interesting trip through the beautiful sculptured ruins, but are all the time trailed, until at last they are intercepted, only to find that in the first telegram there was a mistake in transmission, and that the police were seeking them to render aid rather than to interfere with the duties of their archaeological research.

BIOGRAPH.

THE VENGEANCE OF GALORA (July 28).—In her own outraged sense of injury Galora sought to bring the young express agent into the justice that men might give, while the other woman sought to save his life from moral disaster and won. So the vengeance of Galora worked for the common good—one man was saved in a moment of weakness, while through many thrilling adventures the real offenders were brought to justice.

MISTER SPRIGGS BUYS A DOG (July 31).—Mrs. Spriggs wanted a nice big dog. She gave Spriggs the clothes line to capture one, but with true housewife instinct, she demanded that he must not cut it. A maiden lady cried for her Nero, and Spriggs in the police station was accused of dog felony. It is needless to say there was no addition to the Spriggs' family.

THOSE LITTLE FLOWERS (July 31).—Quite harmless in themselves, but when Mrs. Ronald G. Saunders saw her faithless lord purchasing the innocent blossoms, she was for a divorce right away. Henceforth she would devote her life to charity. The fond one on whom the flowers were bestowed cast them forth. In her pursuit of uplifting the lowly, Mrs. Saunders found them, and the monster husband was at once transformed into a dear, kind, good one.

WHEN LOVE FORGIVES (August 2).—Bessie, the bookkeeper, and Harry, the confidential clerk, are sweethearts. Harry does not fully realize the strength of Bessie's affection, but later, on the eve of a false step, he is made to appreciate her devotion and grit.

THE MONUMENT (August 2).—A little newsboy buries his mother and longs to raise a monument to mark her resting-place. With a few pennies he has saved, he does so, sacrificing every indulgence and even life itself in the end.

PATHEPLAY.

CURIOUS SEA CREATURES (July 29).—There are millions of little creatures serving their particular functions in the scheme of things, but which are unknown to those who have not made a special study of them. The floor of the sea is the home of a great variety of these creatures and this film serves to bring them to our attention in a very interesting manner. Among the fishes studied are the Sea Cucumber, a delicacy of the Chinese table, worth about 35 cents a pound, which is found off the Malay peninsula; the Hippocampus, or Sea Horse, so called because of the remarkable resemblance it bears to a horse's head, and the Bonellia, which moves from place to place by the alternate inflation and deflation of its body.

DAILY DOINGS IN MANILA (July 29).—This film will satisfy the desire of Americans to see just how well the natives of the Philippine Islands are progressing under the rule of the Stars and Stripes.

THE HAUNTED HOUSE (July 30).—On the night she is to be graduated from school, little Violet Watts implores her father to accompany her, as she is afraid to pass a house which has long borne the reputation of being haunted. Jim Watts hesitates because he knows that his enemy, Pete Brooks, is gunning for him, but finally Watts starts for the commencement with his daughter. As they pass the haunted house a noise within is heard. Jim decides to investigate. Pete Brooks has been following Jim stealthily and continues after him into the house. In one of the rooms Watts comes upon his mother talking to Brooks' father. Jim and Pete demand an explanation. The old folks declare that they are old sweethearts and in order to be friends are forced to meet in the haunted house because of the feud between their sons. Their hearts touched by the pleas of the old lovers the two men agree to discontinue the warfare.

THE CALL OF THE BLOOD (July 31).—Thomas Gray arrives at a little Western town with a note from the governor of the state asking the sheriff to help the young man find his sister who, when a child, went West with her father, and has not been heard from for twenty-five years. One of the cowboys, when consulted, says the girl has been brought up by the Indians and is now living at their camp. Tom identifies his sister by a slight scar. He offers to take her back East, but the girl's Indian lover orders her to stay. The girl is undecided, but when the Indian wounds her brother for attempting to take her away by force she hears, for the first time, the call of the blood, and answers.

A STUDY OF BIRD LIFE (August 1).—Lovers of birds, and practically everyone is in that class, will sieze this opportunity to study a number of birds which are so uncommon that many of us have heard of them but never have seen them. The camera pays a visit to the home of the yellowhammer, the hedge-sparrow, the woodcock, arriving here just at dinner time, the owl, where twin owlets are proudly on exhibition, the beautiful hen-pheasant and her young at play, the linnet and her brood waiting for father, and a kingfisher that proves his right to the name by displaying a large fish which he has caught.

MONTE CARLO (MONACO) (August 1).—Monte Carlo is unquestionably the most beautiful spot in Europe and millions of persons journey from the four corners of the globe every year to see it. By means of this film the beautiful resort is brought before your eyes with all of its charm.

WHERE CLOUDS AND MOUNTAINS MEET (August 2).—There is a stage which daily makes a sixteen-mile journey through Yosemite National Park where natural and not artificial beauty reigns. The Pathe camera has taken the same route and as a result the verdant valley is transplated to the screen. On both sides of the beautiful valley are lined enormous peaks (one of them, Half Dome, a mile and three-quarters high) and entrancing waterfalls, Bridal Veil and Yosemite, the latter 2,600 feet high, Vernal and Nevada, spilling their sparkling streams into the turbulent little Merced River that winds its way like a silver thread through the Yosemite Valley.

COLOMBO, CAPITAL OF THE ISLAND OF CEYLON (August 2).—A jinricksha journey through this little town, showing all the scenes of interest, which are indeed many.

THE SPRINGTIME OF LIFE (Special—3 parts—August 1).—Little Gerta, when her mother dies, is brought to her father, Carl Von Seydling, a government official, who deserted his wife and child a few years before. Councillor Van Seydling found the child's presence in his household to be cumbersome and for that reason turned her over to one Sarah Anderson, a nurse. Although Van Seydling did not know it, the Anderson woman was a notorious fagin. She promptly sold Gerta to a beggar, who taught her to beg and to steal. One of her begging trips brings Gerta to the attention of a young man named Alm Stoddard. He becomes interested in the pretty child and upon learning her story is horrified. The police are notified. They arrest her supposed father, but Sarah Anderson escapes.

Little Gerta is adopted by Alm's mother and grows to be a beautiful young woman. Alm falls in love with her, but Gerta has lost her heart to the dashing Lieutenant Wiles. Through Alm's efforts the character of this man is shown to Gerta, and thus she is warned in time. Lieutenant Wiles challenges Alm to a duel and in the encounter Alm is wounded slightly. Gerta, frightened by the trouble she has caused, disappears, leaving a note begging the Stoddards to forgive her seeming ingratitude.

Some years later a grand opera star, Mlle. Hauser, has taken the public by storm. Among her admirers is Alm Stoddard, although he is too fainthearted to write to her or tell her that he knows her to be little Gerta. She, from behind the footlights, has recognized him but, fearing he has not forgiven her, makes no sign of recognition. Another man, in constant attendance at the opera, is Councillor Van Seydling, who has long since believed his daughter dead. By a strange coincidence Sarah Anderson is employed as Gerta's maid. She has not reformed any and when she steals Mlle. Hauser's handbag she extracts a picture of a very little girl. Looking at the picture Sarah suddenly realizes that Mlle. Hauser is none other than little Gerta.

That evening the audience is assembled when a fire breaks out. in the panic that follows Alm is the only one who remembers Gerta. At the risk of his life he brings the unconscious girl out of danger. At the corner drug store Sarah Anderson, mortally injured, is dying. She bares the story of her life and among the listeners is Councillor Von Seydling. The memory of his misdeeds strikes terror to his heart. Van Seydling hurries out and, finding his daughter in the arms of Alm, begs her to forgive him. The girl is mystified, but a little explaining clears the situation. Following custom, Alm asks her father for her hand. Von Seydling asks Gerta to decide and she, clinging to Alm, smiles her contentment.

THE DREAM FAIRY (July 16).—Sylvia, the crippled daughter of Senator Burton, unable to romp and play like other children on account of her deformity, spends much time in reading fairy books and becomes a great believer in the characters. One day she meets Tim, a lame newsboy, who, on account of his infirmity, is not able to sell as many papers as his competitors. She purchases a paper and then offers him her story book. But Tim does not believe in fairies and declines to accept the book. Sylvia is so overjoyed by the news that her parents have engaged a great European specialist to cure her that she falls asleep and dreams that her fairy godmother gives her three wishes. Wishing to see Tim, the little girl finds herself transported to the little newsboy's wretched home. She then wishes that Tim would be cured of his lameness and forthwith the little newsboy throws away his crutches. The godmother then tells her that she has one more wish to make and that she should wish for her deformity to pass away; but being touched by the poverty of Tim's parents she wishes that they be given a lot of money. The little girl then wakes and tells her parents of her dream. The end of the films proves that there must be fairies, for every one of the dreams comes true and besides little Sylvia is cured.

TO ABBEVILLE COURT HOUSE (July 18).—Just before Mrs. Higginbotham dies she writes a letter to Colonel Grandson, her only relative, begging him to take care of her little son, Albert. She entrusts the letter in the care of Uncle Ranse, her faithful old negro servant. After the obsequies Uncle Ranse and Albert start out to the Abbeville Court House, where lives the colonel. Their scant supply of food is soon devoured and Uncle Ranse, touched by the pitiful call for food from the little fellow, leaves him and starts out to get a supply. Just as he is about to appropriate a bag of potatoes he is apprehended and taken to town. In the meantime Albert has been picked up by Captain Ransom, who happened to be passing along the road. The captain and Albert later meet Uncle Ranse and his captor and there is instant recognition between the old darkey and the little boy. Uncle Ranse's explanation releases him and the captain sends the pair on to the Abbeville Court House, where they are well fed for the first time in many days.

ON THE BROAD STAIRWAY (Second of the Kate Kirby Cases) (July 19).—On the eve of his marriage to Alice Osborn, Philip Morton realizes that he cannot marry her; he loves her sister, Marquerite, more than he does his bride-elect. Marquerite breaks down momentarily, but upon hearing her sister's voice, commands Philip to go where his honor calls him. She then goes to a lounge at the head of a stairway and writes a letter to Philip, telling him that while she loves him her little sister's happiness must have first consideration. Hearing the approach of some one, she hides the letters in the lounge.

Into the drawing room, where the guests have been assembled ready for the commencement of the ceremony, a maid rushes with the terrible news that Alice has been found dead upon the stairs with a stab wound in her back. The chief of police is given the case, and with a number of officers and Kate Kirby, the famous woman detective, he arrives at the Osborn mansion, where a rigid search is instituted. Kate finds the hidden letter, and this, together with the knife that is found to be the property of Philip, cause his arrest. Morton is put through a vigorous third degree and the chief, being unable to get a confession from him, leaves him alone with Marquerite, in the hope that he will confess to her. But he only protests his innocence. The whole matter is cleared, however, by Kate, who discovers finger marks upon the lounge.

A TARDY RECOGNITION (July 21).—Florence Aldrich is disinherited because she marries James Harrold against her father's wishes. Mr. Aldrich then gives all his money to his other children, John and Maud, who, after getting possession of it, neglect the old man shamefully. In the meantime and later, through the acquaintanceship formed by

A GREAT METROPOLITAN NEWSPAPER (July 22) (Taken by courtesy of the New York Herald). —An absorbingly interesting series of pictures which follow the life history of the newspaper from the automatic typesetting machine to the hustling, pushing "newsies." From it we gain some idea of the clock-work precision which is necessary that we may enjoy our paper at the breakfast table.

A KNIFE OF FIRE (July 23).—Oxygen and acetylene form the "blade" of this marvelous knife which cuts through a piece of Krupp steel sixteen inches square in four minutes! Think of a man calmly cutting holes in a boiler with a compass! The days of witchcraft are at hand.

AT MIDNIGHT (July 23).—Crash! Aunty sat up in bed screaming, and the terrified family started on a burglar hunt. Papa tiptoed cautiously up stairs and sonny—slightly the worse for wear—knocked him down stairs with an Indian club, thinking he was the burglar. When the policeman arrived he found—a mouse.

THE MEADOW LARK (July 25).—Mamie Meers, who sings in the choir of a simple little country church, is courted by the Rev. John Wilbur. But she is cold towards him and only dreams of the fame that she might receive upon the stage in a big city. Urged on by the ever-present desire to become a great actress, Mamie leaves for the city and manages to get a position as a chorus girl. In her dressing room, as she is waiting to be called, the daisy, which she is holding, brings back the times when she and the reverend gentleman were together in the daisy field, and being so engrossed in her reverie she forgets to appear, and is discharged. After a hard struggle her fine voice secures a position for her in a vaudeville company. Mamie, tired and disillusioned with regard to her theatrical success, tries her best to sing, but being weak, is about to faint, when the minister, who had seen her name billed outside, jumps upon the stage from his orchestra seat, and catches her in his arms. They go back to the little country church, where they are married.

A PROPOSAL FROM THE DUKE (Being the first story of "Who Will Marry Mary?") (July 26). —Mary Cuyler (her real name) at her grandfather's death, was left in possession of a fortune of one hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars a year, representing his interest in the Silver Star Mine in California.

Upon visiting the office of the Trust Company, Mary is surprised and gratified to receive a visit from Mrs. Reed, wife of the president of the Occidental Trust Company and an old friend of her mother. She invites Mary to make her a visit at her country place in Maroneck and Mary accepts.

At the country house Mary meets a brilliant gathering of debutantes and young men. Among the latter are two New York society men, a Scotch nobleman, an Italian duke and Captain Justin Bradford.

The Italian duke, Leonardo di Ferrara, is in a distinctly impecunious state. Suffering from the insistent demands of indignant money lenders, he looks upon the recently arrived young heiress as a direct answer to his prayers.

Captain Bradford falls in love with Mary at his first sight of her, but as he has nothing to recommend him beyond good looks and a sterling character, he has at first little chance against the duke's glittering personality and Machiavellian methods.

The duke succeeds in becoming a hero in Mary's eyes by rescuing her from a fire in the stables, which has been started by a stableman bribed by the unscrupulous nobleman.

A little later, however, Mary is given a true insight into the character of her fond admirer. While she is sailing on the lake with the duke the motor boat is set on fire by the engine. The duke seizes the only available life-preserver and jumps overboard, leaving Mary to her fate. Bradford, who has been following the course of the motor boat with longing eyes, swims to Mary's rescue.

Afterwards when Mary attempts to find and thank her gallant rescuer, she discovers that he has been ordered to headquarters.

THE GREED OF OSMAN BEY (July 28).—Zulika, the beautiful daughter of Osman Bey, swore that no other woman would claim Ahmet, the son of the sheik, when her eyes fell upon him, and Ahmet entertained the same thought of Zulika. But Osman had different plans laid for his daughter—she was to be married to a wealthy rug merchant. When the wealthy suitor came and saw Ahmet in the garden with his arms around the beautiful Zulika, he went at once to Osman, who ordered one of his slaves to throw the intruder into a sealed prison, so that he would suffocate. The slave complied forthwith. Some time later Ahmet's father died and Osman, in fear, released the captive. Ahmet went at once in search of Zulika, whom he found with the merchant about to be made one. Ahmet cast gold and jewels at the feet of Osman, telling him that this should satisfy his greed. Osman, struck by the brilliancy of the jewels, dismissed the merchant and gave his daughter to Ahmet.

THE BELLS (July 29).—At the express wish of her father, Lucy Martin marries Leo Noakes, a stingy man and one twice her age. When they are at church one Sunday a fire breaks out and everybody manages to escape with the exception of Lucy, her husband and her former sweetheart, Walter. While Noakes sinks tremblingly upon the floor, Walter seizes Lucy and brings her to safety. Regardless of his many burns, he dashes back into the roaring flames and drags out old Noakes. But upon investigation it is discovered that he is dead. Even though he had been cruel and harsh to her, Lucy bewails his loss. Some time after the obsequies Lucy succumbs to the wooing of her former sweetheart.

AS THE TOOTH CAME OUT (July 30.)—Terrified at the sight of the dentist's forceps, his victim takes gas and dreams that he is in the clutches of demons. The extracted tooth grows as he gazes at it, and pursues him when he flees, but he awakens in time to escape disaster.

GRAND CANYON OF ARIZONA (July 30).—From the brink of the most famous chasm in the world we gaze across thirteen miles of space to the giant walls opposite. Then, descending 3,000 feet, we come to the turbulent river which has carved this mammoth bed out of solid rock. One of Mother Earth's great wonders superbly photographed.

THE PAPER DOLL (July 29).—George Clements and Alice Wilson are sweethearts. She is also admired by Eugene Raynor, who, calling while George is visiting Alice, is invited to attend a picnic with them the following day. At the picnic Charlotte Lillard, who admires George, induces him to take a stroll with her. Alice sees this and follows the couple. Charlotte places her arm around George and Alice becomes jealous and thinks that George is untrue to her. She, in return, pretends that she likes Eugene and he takes it seriously. George and Alice quarrel and part. The following day Alice is entertaining her little sister, Georgia, and shows her how to make a dress out of paper for the child's doll. The child is delighted and cuts paper until she is able to make dresses for her doll as proficiently as Alice. That evening Eugene calls on Alice and makes love to her. Alice listens to him and he proposes marriage. She still loving George, despite their quarrel, refuses Eugene's proffered love and he starts to go. Just then George calls and Alice refuses to talk to him. George blames Eugene and determines to get even with him. The following day George, desperate, takes his revolver and goes to Eugene's rooms, bent on killing him. After a struggle Eugene succeeds in overpowering him and takes the gun away and keeps it. The gun has George's name inscribed on it. Eugene, resolved that he cannot live without Alice, writes a letter to that effect to her and tells her that he intends killing himself. Just then Belmont, a friend of Eugene, calls and induces him to go out. The note to Alice, having been left on a desk, is blown out the window and falls near where Georgia is playing in her garden. The child cuts it up and makes a dress out of it to fit her doll. Later, Eugene returns and accidentally discharges the revolver, which causes his death. The police arrive and find George's gun. After investigation, George is arrested. Belmont having been told by Eugene of George's threats and attempted violence, informs the police. George is placed on trial for his life and the evidence against him amasses, until there is small prospect of his escaping the electric chair. Alice is sitting at home, lamenting, hoping for George's acquittal when Georgia happens to show her her doll's new dress. Alice takes it and reads Eugene's death message thereon. She rushes to court with it. The evidence in the case was presented on both sides and a sure verdict of guilty was looked for by everybody. The judge has just risen to give his final instructions to the jury when Alice rushes into the courtroom amidst great excitement and insists on seeing the judge. The judge reads the message and confers with the district attorney and counsel for the defense. Eventually the indictment against George is quashed and he is liberated. He thanks Alice for her timely arrival and they, forgetting all past quarrels and differences, acknowledge their supreme love for each other and fall into each other's arms.

WHAT PAPA GOT (August 3).—Pearl and Chester, her sweetheart, rehearse amateur theatricals so as to have an excuse for their lovemaking. As a result they incur the displeasure of Pearl's pa and he forbids Chester calling at the house. This Chester refuses to agree to and pa is compelled to kick him out on his next visit. The next day Chester writes Pearl a note asking her to meet him that afternoon in the park near her home. Pa gets hold of the note and devises a scheme to once for all get rid of the unwelcome suitor. He makes sure that Pearl intends keeping the appointment and then he hires a tough to beat Chester up as he waits in the park for Pearl. The tough that pa hired gets hurt in an accident and he induces his friend, another ruffian, to take his place and to give the waiting victim a very severe trouncing. Pearl is about a half hour late in keeping the appointment and Chester sees Pearl's pa waiting also, a little distance away. Chester sees that pa is on to the game so he strolls away just as the tough comes into view. Pa determines to wait until Pearl shows up and thinks that he will be able to cure her of her infatuation. The tough mistakes pa for the man he is supposed to beat up, and sets sail for him. He literally cuts the old man to pieces, when Chester happens to turn and see it. He rescues pa and takes him home. Pearl is just about leaving, but pa, thankful for his rescue, joins the young couple's hands and insists that Chester is a real hero and worthy of Pearl's hand.

HER LITTLE DARLING (August 3).—Balsam, a gay widower, courts the Widow Snow. She promises to marry him, provided he will always love her and her "little darling," at present at school. They are married, Balsam never suspecting that "little darling" was a cherub weighing two hundred pounds. Later, after the child, so-called, insisted on calling Balsam Papa and sitting on his lap, she is sent back to boarding school. Her mother dies, and Balsam, after the period of mourning is over, decides to take unto himself another wife. He courts the pretty Myrtle Minx, and his suit is successful. They are married, Balsam, of course, neglecting to mention "little darling." Unexpectedly, she pays her father a visit, just as Myrtle's father is visiting them. Balsam is in a quandary. He hides the cherub in another room and she falls asleep. Myrtle insists that she hears a noise in the other room, it being the snoring of the big girl, but Balsam lies out of it. The deception is continued for a while until Myrtle's pet dog jumps on the cherub's shoulder, causing her to awaken and let out a horrifying scream. She, of course, is discovered and Myrtle insists that the woman is not Balsam's aunt, as he lyingly contends. She rushes from the room, and Balsam follows her. Myrtle's father stays with "little darling" and they fall in love. They go away and get married. Returning, they inform the still fighting couple of what has happened, and when "little darling" informs Myrtle that she is her step-mother, as well as her step-daughter, all are in a state of collapse.

IN AFTER YEARS (August 1).—In a double exposure scene, Gertrude is seen dying at the age of forty, and is seen playing her own daughter at the age of eighteen. She sends a letter to Jim, her old sweetheart, asking him to care for her daughter. When Jim gets the letter he sees a vision of his past affair with Gertrude. As boy and girl in the country they are in love. A city chap comes, and Gertrude is attracted to him. He is a drunkard. They arrange an elopement. Gertrude does not know of this. Gertrude passes Jim's house at night and he sees her. The city chap follows. Jim follows the city chap, arrives at the place where he and Gertrude are, and protests. The city chap strikes Jim over the head with the butt of a revolver and he and Gertrude elope. With the passing of years Jim grows prosperous. This ends the vision scene.

When Gertrude comes to Jim he is struck by her resemblance to her mother. He falls in love with her. Another city chap comes. He also is a drunkard. Jim forbids Gertrude from having anything to do with him, fearing she may share her mother's fate. Gertrude flirts with the chap and Jim is angry. The chap takes Jim's automobile and goes to a spot nearby, leaving a note for Gertrude. She follows, leaving a note where Jim finds it. The chap tries to force Gertrude to elope, but Jim comes on the scene and prevents it. He takes Gertrude home in the auto.

Arriving home, Jim is in despair over Gertrude's conduct. She pouts and pretends to be penitent. At the saddest moment in the scene Gertrude says to Jim, "I only went with him to make you jealous. You are so stupid I have to propose to you myself." Jim realizes that happiness has come to him at last.

ECLAIR.

THE GREATER CALL (3 parts—July 23).—A rich society woman, Mrs. Worthington, having received a telegram advising her that her mining interests in Northern Canada are involved in such a serious situation that unless she is prepared to spend a large amount of money in litigation she is likely to lose it all, again tries to persuade her recalcitrant daughter, Margaret, to accept Joe Morton, a wealthy young man, as her husband. But each time, however, the mother meets with a stern refusal, and on one occasion the daughter has an opportunity to show her mother how deeply engrossed Joe is in a game of billiards. Dick Worthington decides to go to their property to try to straighten matters out. He is accompanied by his sister, Margaret, who, after much persuasion, gains the consent of her mother.

While out riding one day, Margaret is seen by one of the two outlaws—Ray Rust and Steven Stone—and he follows her to her bungalow. These outlaws were formerly habitues of the Polka Holla Camp, some hundred miles from the Worthington bungalow, but were driven away for card cheating. Learning of the whereabouts of such a beautiful young girl, these two depraved creatures set out to kidnap her. Coming upon the bungalow when Dick is away, they begin to shake dice for her, but later decide to fight for her. Stone is the victor, and, after making a detour for a minister, forces her into marrying him. As they live together Stone finds his manhood asserting itself and he tries to make her comfortable. He tells her of his wealth and tries to have her return to civilization, where he will make her one of the wealthiest of women. But Margaret remains obdurate.

A child is soon to be born to them and she begs her husband to go away, as she does not consider him worthy to be known as the father of her child. He consents, and that evening as they are on their way they come upon Polka Holla Camp, where Stone observes a sign to the effect that he will be shot on sight for card cheating. The threat of the habitues of the camp would have been carried out were it not for the appearance of Margaret, who, realizing that he has been turning good, jumps in front of him, saying that if he is to be shot, that they must also kill her.

Brick-top Tillie comes to their rescue and takes them to her shack, where they spend the night. In the morning, Margaret will not leave him. Ray Rust, having learned of the camp incident, goes to the city, intent upon bringing harm to Stone, and informs the Worthingtons of the whereabouts of their daughter. Dick, who had long since returned, having given up all hopes of ever finding his sister, at once sets out in company with Ray, to Northern Canada. He takes the ailing Margaret back with him to the city, and Ray, who attempts to murder Stone, only wounds him. When he is convalescing, the would-be murderer is brought before him for identification. Ray is greatly surprised to learn that Stone will not recognize him as the one who tried to kill him, and his consternation is further increased when Stone presses into his hand a Bible that he had received from the camp chaplain.

Not long afterwards Stone receives a letter from Nance Worthington, asking him to come home and see his little son. When he arrives Nance and Mrs. Worthington are taken aback at the appearance of the handsome stranger. Margaret asks her husband to leave her forever, and as he is leaving, a realization of what he is about to do comes to him as he fingers his baby's shoe that he had unconsciously taken. Margaret, conscience-stricken, screams for her husband. The greater call—her child's right to its father—has sounded, and as though in answer, Stone returns to the house and Margaret throws herself in his arms.

ROBINSON CRUSOE (3 parts—July 29).— Robinson Crusoe cannot overcome his great desire to cross the seas in search of adventure, and his parents are much distressed. One day he goes to them and begs to be allowed to ship aboard some vessel, but both his father and mother lecture him and appeal to him and he gives his promise to give up the idea. His desire proves too great for him to keep this promise, and one day he runs away to sea. He has qualms of consciousness as he gazes upon the receding shores and suffers other qualms of a physical nature very soon afterwards. The good ship arrives in the South Seas. A terrible storm arises and the vessel is soon a total wreck, and Robinson is the sole survivor. He reaches shore more dead than alive, and offers up thanks to God for his deliverance. That night, in mortal fear of wild beasts, Crusoe sleeps in a tree. The following morning Robinson sets to work to provision himself and swims to the wreck. He makes many trips and secures supplies and provisions, but what pleases him even more, is in securing a cat and a dog. Later Robinson builds himself a well-stocked and barricaded home and finds solace in hard work. The years pass and Robinson adds to his friends in the form of goats, parrots and other animals, and he repairs daily to his lookout platform in the hopes of seeing a friendly sail.

One day, while making the rounds of his island, he comes across footprints, which strikes terror to his soul and later he sees, through his telescope, the arrival of some canoes containing cannibals. He hurries to the shore and is in time to kill several cannibals, who are pursuing one man who has escaped, and who has been destined for a meal. The cannibals, terrified at the noise, and at seeing their companions fall without being struck, hurry away in their canoes and Robinson makes friends with his man Friday. For two years Friday is Robinson's constant friend and learns to talk his language. Again the cannibals visit the island and this time Robinson and Friday are enabled to rescue a Spanish cast-away sailor and an old Indian, who proves to be Friday's father. Together they make a happy family and Robinson almost forgets his long days of loneliness.

Their peace of mind is broken by the arrival of a small boat from the ship of Captain Hardy, who is rowed ashore, together with his beautiful daughter and bound and left on the rocks. Those members of the mutinous crew who have accompanied Capt. Hardy and his daughter are attacked by Robinson Crusoe and his Trusty Three. That night, while the mate and his companions are throwing dice in the cabin they are suddenly attacked by Robinson Crusoe and his companions, and after a terrific battle, both in the cabin, and later on deck, the crew are defeated. Many of them are only too glad to get away from their murderous companions and enlist under Robinson Crusoe's command. The others are placed upon the island and left there.

Robinson Crusoe and his companions embark on the ship. They are attacked by cannibals, who are repulsed, but in the fight poor Friday is killed by an arrow and is buried at sea, mourned by his father and Robinson Crusoe. On the long voyage back to Crusoe's motherland, his acquaintanceship with the captain's daughter ripens into love. He returns to his native town, where he is received with great rejoicing, and married to the captain's daughter. Robinson Crusoe and his wife live to a ripe old age and he never tires of the circle of children who surround him, clamoring for a recital of his stirring adventures.

REX.

THE POWER OF HEREDITY (July 31).—A young mother, the wife of a dissolute husband, a sailor, is deserted and goes back to service. The Delmars live in the country, and finding it difficult to keep servants, are glad to employ the young girl when she, with her baby, applies to them for a position. The young mother sickens and dies. A letter found among her effects, shows the Delmars it is useless to expect aid from her husband. They decide to adopt the infant and keep her birth a secret.

Eighteen years later we see the girl arriving from school. She promptly falls in love with the butler, thus proving the power of heredity. The butler proves to be a man of resources. He saves the young girl's life in a heroic manner, and she, confiding in her diary, declares, "I must have a yellow streak—I'm in love with the butler."

Later the old sailor returns. The sight of home scenes awaken his heart and he claims his child, Marie. After seeing her real father, she seeks the butler and introduces the men to each other. She then naively asks the butler, "After seeing him, are you afraid to ask me?" Class distinction may prove things not very commendable at times, but in this picture we aptly see that like begets like, and, while environment may change us externally, the unwritten law of heredity invariably asserts itself.

IMP.

THE STRANGER (2 parts—July 28).—John Howard and Jack Noble are business partners. Jack is the junior partner of the firm and is in love with Grace, Howard's daughter. The firm is in financial difficulties and to overcome this Grace is to marry Elbert Havens, a millionaire. Grace loves Jack—Havens loves Grace—Jack insists upon Grace marrying him, but she feels that she is duty bound to help her father and determines to marry Havens, though she does not love him.

At a reception given in honor of her engagement to Havens, the engagement is announced and the couple are recipients of hearty congratulations. Jack sees this and as Havens and the men leave to get refreshments, he takes Grace into the conservatory, where he implores her to elope with him. She refuses, but Jack takes her in his arms. At this moment Havens has returned to the reception room looking for Grace. He starts into the conservatory, but is halted by the sight of her in Jack's arms. Wild with rage he rushes from the house and walks the streets aimlessly. He comes to a moving picture house, and not knowing what he is doing, follows the crowd in.

The guests at the reception are enjoying themselves, and Havens, for the minute is not missed. Howard finally misses him and goes in search of him.

At the picture house the song "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine" is sung. This decides him—that is where he will go—away from sham and duplicity. He hurries home, has his servant pack his clothes, and then writes a note to Grace, telling her that he has gone forever. He then leaves the house, telling his servant he has gone for good and that there will be no need of anyone looking for him.

Grace receives the note after her guests have gone. Her father reads it and upbraids her. He goes to Havens' house—the servant can give him no information as to his master's whereabouts. Fearing that Havens contemplates suicide, Howard rushes to the police station and sends out a general alarm. A reporter, scenting a scoop, rushes to his paper and the next morning the papers are full of news regarding the mysterious disappearance of the millionaire.

The next day finds Havens taking a train from a suburban station for the mountains of Tennessee. He arrives at Stumpville. An old lady also gets off here; she smiles and bows to Havens, and recognizes him as the millionaire from the picture in the paper she has carried from the North. Havens finds his hotel, while the old lady is welcomed home by her husband, son and daughter, Jen. The next morning Havens starts out with his gun and comes across Jen on a bridge. She snubs him and runs away. Havens having made an impression upon the girl, she returns. The impression being mutual, Havens also comes back—the girl again snubs him and runs away, leaving Havens on the bridge watching her.

The next day Havens starts out on a fishing excursion and is attracted to the bridge, where he again finds the girl. He is very polite—his actions are noticed by Lem, the girl's mountain lover, who, after Havens has gone, comes to the girl and sarcastically imitates the city man. He seizes her. This angers the girl; she bites his hand to force him to let her go and runs away. Havens, from a distance, has seen this, and he goes to the girl. Lem, thoroughly enraged, determines to get even; so he informs Jen's father and brother, who are moonshiners, that Havens is a revenue officer. Havens and Jen, having become better acquainted, leave for Jen's home, where Havens meets Jen's mother, who immediately recognizes him. She shows Jen the paper with the picture in it and after Havens has gone she tears the picture part out of it and hides it in her bosom.

That night the mountaineers congregate in front of Jen's home and she overhears them plotting to do harm to Havens. She immediately rushes to his assistance. The mountaineers congregate at the hotel and Havens is hemmed in, but manages to escape. Then ensues a chase through the mountains, where Havens is finally overtaken. As they are about to do him bodily harm, Jen appears, proves who he is, and the mob melts away crestfallen. Havens gives the girl to her mother, telling her to take good care of her for him until tomorrow.

LORD BARRY'S LOW ACQUAINTANCE (July 31).—Lord Barry, is a collie dog of wonderful pedigree, and is owned by a mistress who fairly worships him. He has his own bedroom and private marble bath. His own servants, his private chef, etc. In stern contrast with the beautiful dog's luxurious life, there is shown the daily routine of little "Benny," a waif of twelve years, who is putting up a gallant struggle to keep his independence and make a bare living. Benny lives at 22 Mangen's alley. His home is a barrel in a protected corner, his bed straw, his bath a nearby horse trough.

Times have been hard with Benny, and he is forced to go seeking in refuse cans at back doors for something to stay the pangs of hunger, and fortunately for him, Lord Barry's appetite has been poor that morning, and Benny makes a glorious feast on some chops Lord Barry has disdained to touch. Later the dog jumps out of the automobile to chase a cat that has directed some insulting remark at him, from a near-by fence, and before his mistress can stop and get out of the car, she has lost her dog, and returns home weeping after a fruitless search.

Lord Barry falls into the hands of young rowdies, who tie cans to his tail, and chase him through the alleys of the town. He is rescued by Benny, who wages battle for the terror-stricken dog and finally takes him home to his barrel and shares roof.

Barry's mistress has finally gone into mourning for her lost pet, but picking up a fainting lad in rags on a street corner and taking him to the home, whose address he gives, she finds Lord Barry, who refuses to accompany her home without Benny.

Benny is installed in the luxurious home and a new life is opened for him. A new purpose and a broader view is given to Lord Barry's mistress by the ragged little boy, who exclaimed upon seeing Lord Barry's luxurious home: "Gee, it's great to be a dog."

for some time he has been growing lonely. With this knowledge comes the determination to remedy this state of affairs, and a month later he returns to his mountain home, bringing with him a young and lovely bride.

Edith, the new bride, finds life in the mountains full of delightful days, and is completely happy. She superintends the work of the faithful chinaman who has always cared for John, and completely wins him over by her tender care of her husband. John, however, soon finds matters at the mine not working as smoothly as he wishes, and soon the mine takes up more of his time than during the first months following his marriage, and consequently he fails to show Edith the many little attentions that so pleased her.

It is the old, old story, of a heart hungry for attention and the ever-present temptation. In this case the temptation takes a very pleasing form. Dick Bainbridge, a friend of Norton's, comes for a visit. He is attracted by Edith's fresh young face, and when he finds that Norton is neglecting his wife, Dick's ardor is kindled anew.

Dick and Edith have many pleasant rides and excursions and on one of them Dick attempts to make love to his friend's wife. Edith, knowing Dick's youth, firmly but kindly repulses his advances, and tells him that she loves her husband. Norton, who has returned for a paper, sees the episode from a distance, and mistakes Edith's earnest conversation. He will not listen to an explanation, but orders Dick from his house. Dick attempts to tell Norton that Edith has been faithful in every respect, but Norton, crazed with jealousy, will not heed him. Dick, realizing that Norton is desperate, rushes for the one gun which is on a shelf in the cabin. Dick gets the gun, and pointing it at Norton makes him listen while he tells Norton that Edith repulsed him. Norton still will not believe Dick, and the latter plans a test. He fires the gun in the air, and Edith's great joy when she finds her husband is unharmed, convinces Norton that he still has his wife's love.

Edith, realizing that her husband has doubted her, and thinking he no longer loves her, prepares to take her departure, but Norton sees her from the window, and reaching out as she passes, draws her close to the window and through the open sash draws her into his sheltering embrace.

HIS FRIEND, THE UNDERTAKER (August 1).—Mrs. Newlywed leaves to spend a week in the country. Mr. Newlywed promptly arranges for one of his club friends to make his home his temporary headquarters. In the midst of their mirthmaking a telegram announces a month's visit from the wife's father and mother, they not knowing the daughter was away on a visit.

A small pox sign is being placed on the house next door by the attending physician and Mr. Newlywed conceives the brilliant idea that to offset the pleasure of the parents' visit, he will change the sign to affect his own house, thus insuring peace and happiness. This is done. The police quarantine the house, and later, through the window, Mr. Newlywed and his friend have the pleasure of seeing the parents make hasty retreat on viewing the dreaded sign. Relief by this expedient, however, is rudely marred by the wife, who believes her husband is pining away in loneliness. She cuts short her visit and starts to return home to surprise her husband.

Meanwhile, the boys decide on spending an evening at the theater, but run against a relentless barrier when, on attempting to leave the house, they are informed such a thing is impossible until the health department relieves them. Undaunted, they make many futile efforts to steal from the house, and it is then Mr. Newlywed becomes inspired with a scheme of having his friend, the undertaker, come to the house with a rough coffin and assist in effecting their escape under the pretense of death and the removal of the bodies. It is at this juncture, as the box is being reverentially placed in the wagon, that the wife appears. Horrified, she learns from the officers of the death (?) of two men in her house. Before she has an opportunity of fainting, the doctor arrives on the scene, having learned the sign as originally placed was tampered with. Mr. Newlywed, hearing his wife's voice, raises the lid and is detected as he is peering out. He and his companion are rudely withdrawn from the coffin and the doctor orders their arrest.

Mr. Newlywed, without realizing the effect of his excuse, pleads to his wife to assist them, explaining the telegram from her parents. This incenses her and she permits the arrest. Later, as the two culprits are serving a 30-day sentence, Mrs. Newlywed compels her husband to personally write a letter to her parents to make them a six months' visit, and he is forced to smile as he later bids them welcome.

WHILE THE CHILDREN SLEPT (July 30).—The long, hot days spent in ironing are nearly finished, and Bobby and mother leave to deliver the Reids' clothes. Their faithful old dog, Tige, Bobby's only plaything, is hitched to his soapbox wagon and with the clothes aboard they set out for the Reid mansion. On the lawn of her father's mansion, little Doris is having a tea party when the washerwoman and her child arrive. Little Bobby is left outside while the mother delivers the clothes. Doris spies him and, bribed by a piece of cake, Bobby takes her in the soapbox wagon for a ride.

The next day, Bobby, lured by the memory of cake and Doris, goes alone to the mansion and again meets his "angel." Mrs. Reid is issuing invitations to Doris' birthday party and Doris, taking one, gives it to Bobby. Bobby, knowing social etiquette demands a birthday present, sells Tige for a nickel to another urchin, and with tear-wet eyes invests the nickel in a candy heart for Doris.

His entrance to the Reid mansion is challenged by the butler, but Bobby's assurance and the invitation get him in. Although surprised, Mrs. Reid lets him remain and all goes well until Paul, who before had resented the plebeian, starts a fight in which Bobby's street training stands him in good stead. Peace restored, hide and seek is proposed, and the children all join in eagerly. Slim Jim, a burglar, decides to lift whatever he can get of value from the Reid mansion, and he places a ladder against the house to an upstairs room, during the afternoon. Doris and Bobby, seeking a hiding place, rush upstairs and hide in a closet. The stillness and darkness of the closet cause them to become drowsy, and the children fall asleep. The hide and seek game is interrupted by not finding Doris, and, a lengthy search being made, Mrs. Reid becomes hysterical and telephones her husband that Doris has been stolen. The guests, heartbroken, leave and hubby arrives. When evening comes and they are still unable to find any trace of the missing child, the father telephones the police station to send out some officers.

Meanwhile, Slim Jim crawls into the upper windows and his footsteps wake the children. Cautiously opening the closet door, Bobby noiselessly sneaks to the window and pushes the ladder away. His lusty yells for help, which Slim tries to stop, bring the police and father and mother, also Bobby's mother (whose search has led her to the Reid mansion) upstairs. Slim falls into the arms of the law.

Bobby accepts his congratulations royally and sneaks away with Doris. Alone with her, he gives her the candy heart, which the costliness of her other presents has caused him to conceal, and to its red letter interrogation, "Will you marry me?" Doris nods a shy assent.

FATE AND THREE (August 1).—After a storm at sea, Henry is washed ashore and rescued by Mary, her brother, John, and her mother. They take him to their shack by the sea and attend him. Henry recovers and becomes a member of the simple family, helping in their fishing expeditions. He falls in love with Mary, who returns his love. They become engaged. Alma, a woman of the village, also falls in love with him, but he refuses to have anything to do with her. John goes to town to get supplies. Mary and Henry are seated on the rocks and are seen by Alma, who comes on just as Mary leaves and returns to the house. Seeing that Mary is watching them, Alma throws herself into Henry's arms. She then goes on to the house, changing her ring from one hand to another, and tells Mary that she and Henry are engaged. Mary believes Alma and accuses Henry of unfaithfulness. Mary's mother, who has witnessed the scene between Alma and Henry and heard the argument between Mary and Alma, is overcome with excitement and dies of heart failure. Mary becomes crazed with grief and accuses Henry of causing her mother's death. While Mary is in the house brooding over her trouble Alma enters. She goes to Mary and gives her a knife. Mary determines to kill Henry, as Alma had planned. She leaves the house, followed by Alma. Mary comes upon Henry lying beside an overturned boat which he is repairing. Mary crawls over the boat from the opposite side and is about to stab Henry when John, returning from his trip, comes upon the scene, rushes to the end of the boat, lifting it and throwing Mary to the ground, thus saving Henry. Explanations ensue and Mary is brought to a realization of what she has attempted. Alma is driven from the village by the neighbors, and Mary and Henry are reunited.

Not long after war is declared and David is given the captaincy of a company. Before David leaves for the front, Jim takes an actress friend, Miss Gordon, into his plot and has a letter written to David asking him to call upon the actress at eleven o'clock if he wants to secure some valuable information. Another letter is written to Marion telling her to be around the house mentioned in the letter at eleven o'clock if she wishes to avoid an unhappy marriage and to learn of the unfaithfulness of her sweetheart. David arrives at the house at the stated time, and in accordance with Jim's plot, Miss Gordon suddenly becomes sick and falls into the arms of David, just as Marion appears. that it is all over between them. David comes for an explanation, but Marion will not receive him.

Four years later David is instructed by General Lee, who has taken his headquarters in the Durard mansion in Petersburg, to gain information concerning General Grant's plan to wipe out his starving army. Following out their pre-arranged plan, Old Mammy, the Durard's old servant, is chased by some Confederate soldiers dressed as overseers into the Union camp. Informing the Union soldiers that she has run away from a cruel master, they take her to the officers' headquarters, where she is given work. She hears that Grant contemplates making an attack on the left wing of Lee's army, and bringing into play the secret code made between herself and the Confederate soldiers, hangs certain wearing apparel in certain positions along the clothes line. This is observed by the far away Southerners through their field glasses, and Lee makes a very successful attack.

Marion, whose home is near Petersburg, and which is within the Federal lines, has been entertaining some Union soldiers. On one occasion, when Nelson, a Union captain, was playing with her little sister, a note drops out of his pocket, which gives the information that Colonel Mosby's cavalry is coming to reinforce Lee's army. Marion makes a copy of the message and hurries to the Confederate lines. She reaches Lee, who forthwith details David with a despatch for Col. Mosby to hurry along. Unable to get to her home, Marion becomes a nurse in Lee's army.

In the meantime General Grant has held a secret meeting in order to discover the leak of information. Suspicion rests upon Old Mammy. their suspicions are confirmed when Old Mammy is caught reading her code. She is courtmartialed and shot. In order to deceive Lee, Grant has certain clothes placed in such positions on the line, which, when interpreted, convey the information that Grant is going to attack the left wing of Lee's army, when in reality he is planning to attack the right. Lee's army is being badly annihilated when Col. Mosby's cavalry arrives and drives the Unions back. Jim Black is badly wounded, and just before he dies makes a confession to Marion of how he estranged her and her lover.

The battle still rages and Col. Mosby mines the bridge. As darkness sets in, there is cessation in the hostilities. David is shot in the shoulder and is brought to the field hospital for treatment, where he meets Marion. He learns of Jim's confession and forgives Marion for her past actions towards him.

GRAND-DAD (2 parts—July 23).—Old Jabez Burr is shown with his little grand-daughter, Mildred. She receives a letter from her father that he is coming home with a new mamma for her, and telling her to warn grand-dad to hide his black bottle, as the lady is a great church worker and is opposed to liquor. Jabez is a veteran of the civil war, and has been wont to meet his old army cronies and fight again the great battles in which they took part, and his fast ebbing strength has been stimulated by liquor. Mrs. Burr arrives, and soon becomes a leader in the church work of the neighborhood. Grand-dad slyly hides his bottle. Mrs. Burr nags grand-dad frequently, and finally in an outburst of anger she tells him that he is contaminating Mildred.

The old man is crushed, and resolves to go away. That night, when all is still, he quietly kisses Mildred good-bye as she sleeps, and starts out. Mr. Burr hears him moving about, and thinks burglars are in the house. He finds his father and pleads with him to stay, but the old man is determined, and says: "Your wife must be considered first. I must not come between you. It is best that I should leave." Now, grand-dad is very old, and he cannot find work. He is finally compelled to seek refuge in the poor-house, where he is put to work in the field. A stranger comes to town, a man with martial tread and an empty sleeve. He is seeking Jabez Burr, and to the old soldiers in the tavern he tells the story (which is shown in the film), of how Jabez saved his life. The stranger is a Confederate colonel. The colonel, with shattered arm, was dying when Jabez Burr—his enemy—moved to sympathy, carried him off the field to the union hospital. Jabez was captured and hurried to a Confederate prison. After the war the colonel had made incessant search for his rescuer, and had finally traced him to his son's residence, where he was informed that Jabez had gone away. The ladies of the church, including Mrs. Burr, visit the poor house. Little Mildred is taken along, and in running about the grounds she meets grand-dad. A touching scene takes place, and Mrs. Burr is mortified when it is found that the old man is her husband's father. When they return home Mildred tells her father, and he is very angry and ashamed. He tells his wife very decidedly that regardless of anything, he is going to bring his father home. Early the next day he starts for the poorhouse. Poor old granddad is working in the field, when he is suddenly stricken by the heat. He is carried indoors, just as the colonel arrives. When Mr. Burr reaches the scene granddad is nearing the end. In his dying delirium he has a vision of the sunset gun being fired, and rising to a sitting position, he salutes the flag and falls back, dead.

THE SCAPE GOAT (2 parts—July 28).—John Fordyce and Alwyn Jasper are the two bank clerks who cannot resist the temptation of using their employer's funds in an effort to enrich themselves. Both young men are in love with Beauty Van Sant. John meets with favor. When by chance Jasper detects the defalcations of John, he works on the latter's sense of honor and pride so that the latter deems himself unworthy of the affections of the girl. Jasper makes good the shortage by further dishonest methods. John, on the other hand, confides to Beauty the crime he has committed and the noble spirit of Jasper in appreciation of which he breaks his engagement and allows Jasper to plead and win his cause. Jasper continues his dishonesty, but cleverly weaves a circumstantial case against John, so that when the exposure comes, John, feeling himself under obligations to Jasper, pleads guilty to the charge of forgery, and is sentenced to five years of penal servitude.

After four years of hard labor, John is paroled for good behavior. At Jasper's home the death of the only child and his indifference to home ties do not enhance matrimonial bliss. Jasper dies as the result of an accident, but on his death bed makes a confession completely vindicating John. Beauty seeks the prison warden in an effort to make amends to John, but he has already been liberated. Her life's occupation is now to find John, and because of her failure, attaches herself to a rescue mission, where, after patient waiting, her diligence is awarded by discerning in a veritable wreck the man who, because of his love for her had made such inestimable sacrifices. At her home later the two read the confession of Jasper, and both come to a stronger realization of the kindly hand of fate.

MISSION BELLS (July 31).—Wealthy Jack Worthington, an atheist, purchases a home in the beautiful mission town. He gets acquainted with Barbara Gordon, a devout church girl, and it is not long until the interest aroused by the first meeting develops into love. All seems to be going smoothly and Jack proposes. A vital question with Barbara is the religious attitude of her husband-to-be and she puts the question boldly. The couple is seated in a hammock and her question is acted out in a beautiful vision. The answer is seen in the frivolous look that spreads over the countenance of the atheist. Of course there is no engagement.

Jack, on a hunting expedition, meets with a mishap, is found by a monk who has him taken to a nearby monastery where he is given every attention. While here the atheist is converted and later renews his attentions to Barbara, who finally accepts his attentions upon the monk's assurance of her lover's sincerity.

SINGLE-HANDED JIM (August 2).—Jim makes a bet that he can stop the stage coach on two successive days, and this in spite of the fact that the sheriff boasts of his authentic record that no gun man has escaped him in his time of service. A little love element enters the story when the sheriff's daughter shows favor to Jim and disregards the deputy sheriff, an ardent admirer. Jim accomplishes the feat in a masterful manner. The deputy sheriff emulates the example in such a manner as to reflect on Jim, but his desire foils his plot and he comes under the strong arm of the law.

FUNNICUS AT LUNA PARK (July 17).—Funnicus has made a futile endeavor all day to be cheerful, but conditions will not permit. Seeking forgetfulness, he took his despondent way towards Luna Park, and started to "do" the place thoroughly. An overplump dame was giving tense ear to the whispered warnings of a Gypsy sooth-sayer. An opportunity! Funnicus crossed the swarthy female's palm with much silver, and promptly slipped into her wrappings and place.

The overplump dame was then regaled with a series of disclosures concerning her future affairs of the heart which brought Funnicus an unexpected clump on the ear. Funnicus, to mete out counter-punishment to the saucy lady, proceeded to chase her over the zig-gag stairways, windy passages, electric railways, sea wave track, automobile armchairs, etc. At last, to escape retaliation, he borrowed an attendant's costume and the Tzigane band-master's baton * * * one, two, three * * * the syncopated sounds begin their infectious course and everybody finds himself tripping the light fantastic.

ECHINODERMS (The Starfish) (July 17).—Sea urchins, Holothuroidea and star fish are the most common species of the genus Echinoderms. The first two varieties are edible, and much esteemed by epicureans. All varieties are small in size. They live in salt water and have carnivorous tendencies. The name "Echinoderms" signifies bristling skin—a characteristic, another being that of symmetrical radiation in form—the starfish, you will remember, branching into five "fingers."

These invertebrates have a well-developed internal organization. There is a distinct blood-vascular system, a nervous system, etc. Their sense of touch centers in areas bearing rows of suckers which constitute the centres of locomotion, breathing and feeling. Mobile spikes, known scientifically as "Pedicellaria," which terminate in minute "forceps," are the means of securing food, fastening on adversaries, etc.

DOES GONTRAN SNORE? (July 24).—Ah, Solange, you charming girl! what a conquest you will make!"

Madame, the dowager countess, greeted her petite niece, Mlle. de Mousses enthusiastically, for her school days were now at an end, and Madame had to seek an eligible parti for the young heiress' espousal.

"I have it! Gontran! My child, do you remember tousle-headed Gontran, your playmate, my god-child?"

"Indeed and I do, dear aunt; is it him you wish me to marry? Then I sincerely hope he does not snore; for if he snores—pouf! I'll not be troubled by the thought of him a moment.

Madame the countess laughed at her quaint niece. Gontran came on a visit, overtired from his long journey. After a heavy luncheon, he apologetically droused off. Madame the countess was annoyed; Solange delighted, for shortly they could tell whether he snored or not. A turn round the garden and horrors! Bloodcurdling sounds smote the air with painful regularity. Solange wept bitterly. Madame the countess entered to wake the hapless youth.

But she found Anatole, her butler, in Gontran's chair, with incriminating liquor at his elbow. Gontran, returned after a refreshing sponge, explained that Anatole had disturbed him while clearing the table and he had left to freshen up and seek the ladies. Solange and he, already strongly predisposed towards each other, then and there exchanged a betrothal kiss, to Madame the countess' complete satisfaction.

THROUGH TURKEY AND THE BLACK SEA (July 24).—Fireside travelers are presented in this film to a series of views of the Black Sea, which is none other than the ancient Euxine Sea. It lies between Southern Russia and Turkey in Asia, connecting with the Sea of Marmora and the Mediterranean by the Bosphorus. During hard winters, it is a common occurrence to see an ice-coating on the Black Sea, in contrast with the Mediterranean, which is invariably warm.

The coast between the Bosphorus and the mouth of the Kouban is flat and indented by lagoons, generally shallow and unfit for the establishment of large harbors. The Asiatic Coast, contrariwise, is admirably suited to commercialization. Trebizonde, a fairly modernized town in Asiatic Turkey, shows interestingly the encroachment of the new on the old customs.

THANHOUSER.

BRETHREN OF THE SACRED FISH (July 20).—The butcher was a very large and muscular man. He was the town's champion boxer, and those who dared to contest his title always got the worst of it. The druggist was not athletic and he was timid. He loved a girl who read romantic novels, and who idolized the dashing heroes of books, who triumphed despite all obstacles. The druggist was not at all dashing. The girl knew it and despised him.

The girl was passing the butcher shop when she slipped and fell. The butcher rudely laughed, and the girl, her mind bent on vengeance, sought out the druggist and hissed, "Slay the dragon and I am thine." She referred to the butcher, and the druggist knew it. A hero of slender physique can thrash a 200-pound villain in a novel, but in real life—! The girl insisted that all was over between them unless the butcher was punished, so it had to be done.

The vulnerable spot in this Achilles of the meat shop was that he belonged to all the secret societies in town, and prided himself that he could exchange salutations with the brethren of all organizations. The druggist, who had more brains than muscle, recalled this fact, and resolved to profit by it. In a day or two it was announced that a new secret society, "The Brethren of the Sacred Fish," had been organized, and the butcher tried to join it. The druggist, who was the grand master, apparently did not care to take any more members, but finally consented to accept the anxious butcher.

The meat dealer had a very strenuous initiation in the lodge room and then was taken in front of the drug store "to learn humility at the hands of our worthy grand master." The girl was present and breathlessly watched her champion pummel the unresisting butcher. She did not know it was "an initiation," and gladly consented to marry the druggist at once. It was not until the happy pair were safely on their honeymoon that the butcher learned that his new honor was an empty one, for "The Brethren of the Sacred Fish" was dissolved.

WHEN DARKNESS CAME (July 22).—The pretty little stenographer was the belle of the office, and was happy because all of the clerks paid her attention. Even her employer's son deigned to take notice of her, and took her on several delightful short trips in his automobile. There was one man, however, upon whom she never wasted her fascinations. He was the chief clerk, a shy, reserved, hardworking individual, who seldom paid her any attention, yet it would have surprised the girl had she known that he worshipped her in secret and longed for a chance to prove his love.

The chance came and he proved his worth. The girl's eyes had been bothering her, but she gaily disregarded the orders of her physician. One day while at work, her sight suddenly failed, and she was removed to her shabby room in a boarding house, practically penniless, and with the prospect of being long incapacitated.

The chief clerk was the first of her callers, and he heartened her up immensely. He told her that their employer, whom she had always regarded as a mean, stingy old man, had announced his intention of paying her doctor and nurse, and that her salary would be continued indefinitely. He brought her bouquets and fruit, which he said had been sent by certain of the other clerks, and managed to convince her that although absent, she was still the queen of the office.

It was some months before the girl was restored to health, and with joyful anticipation she repaired to the office to thank the ones who had been so good to her. Speedily was she disillusioned. Her employer gruffly told her that her salary had ceased on the day she was stricken, and he even refused to re-engage her now that she was well. The other clerks greeted her coldly, and she saw that their fickle attentions had been diverted to another stenographer as empty headed and pleasure loving as she herself had been.

Her doctor told her the real story after she had tearfully begged for it. The only man who had been kind to her was the chief clerk, and it was his money that had saved her from becoming an object of charity. She realized how great his love was, and it humbled her. He had meant to have kept it a secret, but she would not have it that way, and when he at last told her how he loved, she gratefully accepted the heart of gold which kind fortune had placed in her path.

THE TOP OF NEW YORK (July 25).—A dapper sergeant in the army won the love of a pretty young stenographer, and they had planned that as soon as his term of enlistment was up he would enter private life and marry her. The girl was employed by a firm who had offices in one of the tallest of New York's skyscrapers, and her sweetheart saw her there. She took him to her favorite observatory, the roof of the building, where he obtained a magnificent and uninterrupted view of the greatest city in the world. He, on his part, took his sweetheart to the army maneuvers, where she witnessed with delight the well drilled troops, but would not confess that there was one man among them who could not compare with the one of her choice. She was particularly interested in the signal corps, however, and at odd times the sergeant instructed her in the code until she had become fairly proficient in it.

One Saturday afternoon the girl repaired to her "observatory" and gazed longingly toward Governor's Island, for it was there that her fiance was stationed. In some way the door to the roof became closed behind her and as it was a spring lock, she found herself a prisoner. Beating on the door failed to bring her any help. The crowds in the street, many, many feet below, could not see or hear her, and she finally realized with growing terror that the relief would probably not come before Monday morning. Exposed to the elements all that night, she was on the verge of a breakdown the following morning, and knew that she could never stand another twenty-four hours of privation. Suddenly she thought of the signal code ~~which~~ she had laughingly learned from her soldier sweetheart. With her veil and a piece of wood she found on the roof, she improvised a rude flag, and facing Governor's Island, repeated over and over again the one word, "Help."

Fortunately for her, the sergeant had a visitor that day, a sea captain, and he pointed out to him the magnificent building where the girl of his heart was employed. The captain took a closer glance through his field glasses, caught the signal, and the man she loved was able to save the girl who, when he found her, was unconscious and rapidly nearing death.

MAJESTIC.

THE PAJAMA PARADE (July 20).—Tommy Thompson suggests to a number of fellow students that they have a pajama parade and serenade the girls. Slipping their pajamas over their suits, the boys dance the serpentine on their way to the girls' dormitory. Arriving, they are disappointed when the girls fail to appear.

Tommy, discovering a light in the window, places a ladder beneath it and investigates. The girls are having "High-Jinks," and a burlesque glove contest is in progress. Rev. Granger happens along and reproves the boys. They force him up the ladder. Seeing a girl in ballet costume imitate a Russian dancer, he refuses to come down.

Betty and three other girls, hearing the noise outside, leave the room, enter the one above, and drench Granger and the fellows with water. Running to the boys' dormitory, the girls "stack" Tommy's room, piling chairs, tables, etc., in the center. They are about to tub Cole, a Freshman, when the rest of the boys return, and the girls are obliged to leave.

Betty runs across the campus, pursued by Tommy, and both land in the arms of the watchman, who reports them to the Student Affairs Committee. The following day they are suspended from college.

While waiting for the train, Tommy, who is engaged to Betty, catches sight of Rev. Granger. The boys hold the Rev. while Tommy secures a marriage license. Rev. Granger is compelled to perform the ceremony, and the couple board the train, amid cheers and good wishes.

THE MIGHTY HUNTER (July 22).—Barnes has the reputation of being a daring and mighty hunter. His house is filled with souvenirs of his prowess with the gun. At a dinner to some of his club friends he tells them of some of his adventures, his hair-breadth escapes, hunting tiger and lion in the African jungle, elephants in India. In proof of the veracity of his tales he conducts them to another room and shows them his collection of guns and trophies, tusks and skins. He has one regret; he has never shot a bear. One of his guests, Tom, who has a ranch in Arkansas, invites him out there, where he can shoot bear to his heart's content—the woods are full of 'em. Barnes shakes hands and accepts.

On the day of Barnes' arrival Tom goes into the corral to catch one of his horses. He has a halter concealed behind him and takes from his pockets some sugar to coax the horse. He hitches up and drives to town. He looks at his watch and stops on the street to see an Italian organ grinder performing tricks with a trained bear. The Italian, after each trick, gives the bear a lump of sugar. Suddenly the bear becomes unruly and escapes. The Italian takes after him, but loses him in the nearby woods.

Tom meets Barnes at the depot and drives home with him. He shows him his collection of skins—bears of all varieties nearly. Then he gives him a gun and an old hunting coat that he had himself worn that morning when catching the horse. Barnes starts out. Once out of sight of the house his fears assert themselves. He starts at every noise and becomes more and more frightened, until, when a real bear appears, he fires in the air and takes to his heels. The bear chases him. Tom sees Barnes coming, takes in the situation and laughs heartily. Barnes, to conceal his embarrassment, shoots: "Tom, Tom, I'm bringing him home alive!"

It turns out that it is only the Italian's bear, and all the poor animal wants is the sugar concealed in the pocket of Tom's coat, which Barnes is wearing. Barnes is very much mortified.

RELIANCE.

A HOSPITAL ROMANCE (July 21).—From his private room in an expensive hospital, young John Gilbert, through a pair of opera glasses, sees a little crippled dancer in the window of a theatrical boarding house opposite. He becomes so interested in this girl that he sends his own doctor over to attend her. He learns that she has had an accident and will never be able to dance again. Daily he sends her gifts, flowers, books, etc. She receives them gladly, as they contain no card from the mysterious donor. Gilbert, on the way to recovery, meets a great surgeon from abroad. His first thought is—could he cure that girl across the way? After consulting with the doctor, the surgeon accepts commission from Gilbert to visit the girl. When she learns what he has done for her, she refuses to accept the assistance of a man she does not know, much as she would like to get well. But Gilbert sends her a letter stating that she has brought a new interest into his life and helped him recover and asks that he be allowed to do the same for her. She finally consents. The operation is performed successfully and the girl returns to the stage. Gilbert watches her and later meets her. After a long acquaintance, during which he never betrays the fact that he was the man who had helped her, he asks her to become his wife. She refuses him and tells the story of her unknown friend to whom her heart is given. Then Gilbert tells her the truth, and she, surprised, but very pleased, willingly accepts his ring.

MARIA ROMA (July 23).—Maria Roma, a beautiful Italian opera singer, while performing in the Grand Opera House at Naples, attracts the attention of Lawrence Malet, an American millionaire. He is introduced to her and a mutual attraction is the result. Maria and Lawrence become good friends, to the great jealousy of Capucci, Maria's manager. Seeing her enter the theater on Lawrence's arm, Capucci protests his love. She laughs at him. He forces his attentions on her until she, frightened and unnerved, refuses to go on that night. Lawrence, in his box, hears the announcement that owing to a sudden indisposition of the great soprano, there will be no performance that evening. Worried, he hurries around to Maria's dressing room, where she tells him the trouble. He wants to go after Capucci, but she refuses to allow this. Putting her cloak about her he insists that she leave the theater with him and be married at once. She consents. After the wedding, Maria and her American husband live happily in Naples until one day she receives a letter from Capucci stating that he will never die until he has found a way to be revenged on her and her husband. To avert this vengeance from her husband, Maria decides to leave him at once. During Lawrence's absence, his wife embarks on a steamer bound for America, where, under an assumed name, she sings in the cheap Italian theaters. Lawrence, finding Capucci's note, realizes why Maria left him. His detectives trace her to America, and in the hope of finding his beloved wife there Lawrence returns to his own country. Capucci also goes to America and discovers Maria in the cast of an East Side Carmen company. Seeing a chance for revenge, he goes to the tenor of this organization, who is an old friend of his, and prevails upon him to let him sing his role that night. Lawrence, wandering about the Italian quarters, also happens into the theater. Maria recognizes Capucci when he comes out on the stage, and seeing the dagger in his hand, realizes that he intends to turn the stage tragedy into a real one. As he advances toward her, knife in hand, she shrinks away. Lawrence, in a stage box, recognizes Maria and starts forward. Then he sees Capucci and, realizing his wife's danger, jumps over the box rail just in time to grab the Italian's dagger. Maria falls into her husband's arms and Capucci in the grasp of two policemen snatches a knife from the belt of one of the actors and kills himself.

THE HIGHER JUSTICE (2 parts—July 26).—Brice, a rich young college fellow, sees a pretty country girl driving with her mother. He bets that he will make her acquaintance. He does so by pretending his motorcar needs watering and stopping at her father's door. He seizes the first chance to make love to her, but her father sees this and orders him from the farm. She believes in Brice, however, and meeting him again, accepts his offer to go motoring. One of his friends, as a joke, turns his collar about, pretending to be a minister. This gives Brice an idea and the girl is tricked into a mock marriage. Brice disappears from college; the girl from her home. Detectives trace the young man, through his checks to a country hotel. His father goes to him and finding him with the girl, gives him a choice between leaving her and being disowned. Then Brice tells her the truth and she, stunned and heartbroken, sees him depart with his father.

Now is shown the world's attitude toward the man and the woman. The man meets the joke and the glad hand, the girl the raised sword of society. Hearing that he is about to marry another, she goes to him and tells him she is going to be a mother. She begs him to give the child a name. He refuses, while from another room the guests at his bachelor dinner sing, "For he's a jolly good fellow." A son is born to the girl, in poverty and disgrace. Later, a child is born to Brice's wife, who raises her son in luxury. Years pass. The poor girl's son rises step by step in the little office of a country lawyer and is at last admitted to the bar. Brice's legitimate son is sent to college and there follows in the footpaths of his father. Petted, spoiled and pampered, this son of wealth has never had a real chance. While his hard-working brother meets and falls in love with a simple country girl, he falls into the clutches of a female crook who takes all she can from him and is about to leave town with her pal. Young Brice follows them in his car, raises a quarrel with the man whom, in a sudden outburst of anger, he murders. The woman prevents his escape. He is taken to town and his brother, who, of course, does not know him, is designated as commonwealth attorney to try the case. He does try the case, smashing the defense all to atoms and breaking his brother to pieces on cross-examination. During the recess of the court, his mother brings him his lunch and there she finds the man who has ruined her, trying to bribe her son. The sight of this drives her mad and she denounces him. Allen finds it is his brother he is sending to the chair. But in his rage against the man who has ruined his mother, he goes on with the case. The pitiful sight of his brother moves him and he turns the trial on the father as the real criminal who bred his son in vice and drunkenness and is the main instigator of the crime. The son, during the excitement of the denunciation, springs up. His father tries to drag him back. The boy strikes him and falls dead.

Later, alone in the cell, bending over the dead body of his son, Brice realizes the Power of the Higher Justice which has spoken at last.

BANZAI (2 parts—August 1).—Lieutenant Banks, of the United States Army, on special service in Japan, secretly courts Mirami, the daughter of a Samurai. Osaki, her brother, discovers the situation and warns his sister against the American. Banks is ordered back to America, and tells Mirami to be faithful and he will send for her. A year passes, and Lieutenant Banks marries an American girl, while Mirami still faithfully believes that he will return to her and her infant. She has been disowned by her father, and is living alone with a servant.

The United States Ambassador writes to Banks, telling him about the child, and he replies: "I was shocked and surprised to hear the news. I want to do all I can for the baby. Explain to Mirami the social barrier that prevented my marrying her. Beg her to send the baby to me that I may look out for his future. Cable me result." Osaki has been ordered to America in the secret service of his country, and he plots with his sister for revenge on Banks. She complies with Banks' request and sends the baby to him, but travels on the same boat, disguised as a man, accompanied by Osaki. In California Osaki secures employment as a fisherman, while Mirami is engaged by Lieutenant Banks as servant. Her face touches his memory, but in her disguise he does not recognize her.

THE COAT THAT CAME BACK (July 30).—Uncle John sews ten one-thousand-dollar bills inside the lining of his frock coat for safe keeping. Suddenly stricken and about to die, he hastily writes a will and leaves the coat to his nephew, John Clark. Clark receives the coat, but is unaware of the money it contains. He expected a fortune, and in his disappointment and resentment at receiving only a coat, he attempts to destroy it. His wife rescues it and pleads with him to keep it; but he wont, and orders her to get rid of it. She gives it away, first to the milkman, and then to a hobo, but in each instance it comes back—the milkman leaves it hanging on the fence, and the hobo returns it because its stylish appearance gets him into trouble with the police. Mrs. Clark hangs it on the clothesline in the yard. A sneak thief runs off with it, but an artist who is passing gives chase and rescues it. He brings it back to the house and returns it to Clark. Clark wont take it, and compels the artist to keep it. The artist, in need of money, sells it to a second-hand dealer. Clark, in need of a frock coat to attend a wedding, buys Uncle John's coat from the second-hand clothier, but does not discover its identity until he gets home with it. He resells it to the clothier. The clothier sells it to a preacher. The preacher, carrying it home done up in a paper bundle, leaves it on a bench in the park. Some boys find the bundle, and using it as a football, kick it about the streets. In their fun it lands in Clark's front yard. Clark picks it up, carries it into the house and discovers it is Uncle John's coat. Angered at the persistence with which the coat comes back to him, he starts to rip it to pieces, and in so doing discovers the money in the lining, and thus finally comes into possession of his fortune.

WHEN THE TIDE TURNS (August 1).—Disagreeable Brown, who also has a disagreeable family, receives word that old Uncle Pete is coming for a prolonged stay. Uncle Pete, a sunny-tempered old fellow, is poor and is shifted about from pillar to post among his ungracious relatives. The Brown family makes the old man's life so miserable that he loses all his buoyancy and grows sad and feeble. He has one stanch friend, however, the pretty Widow Allen, a neighbor of the Brown's. This lady is comfortably off, but in case she remarries, she loses her income. Uncle Pete puts up with conditions until ill-treatment and ridicule breaks him all up. At last, he creeps to his room in the garret, packs his grip and walks to the poorhouse. He sends the kind little widow a pathetic note, thanking her for her past kindnesses. The widow, upon getting the note, is very angry at the selfish relatives, and full of grief for the desolate old gentleman. After thinking matters over, she decides to take the old man to her home and defy "the speech of people." Her life has been exemplary, and she feels that the God she loves and trusts will understand. She writes the old uncle that she is coming for him. The old man deeply moved and his heart bursting with thanksgiving, goes with the old lady, and they take up their life under the same roof. But just at the critical moment a notice comes to old Pete, informing him that he is heir to a small fortune. Reading the news in the local paper, Brown and his wife change their tactics and go to bring dear old Uncle Pete back home. They get all they bargain for from the toe of Uncle Pete's boot. Pete marries the widow and the sunny-hearted old couple spend their remaining days in peace and tranquility.

THE TINY TROUBADOUR (July 17).—Tiny Tim's latest singing partnership is concerned with one "Singing Bird"—an itinerant Caruso of sparse build and erring locks, whose throaty voice is tinged with adenoids, and who warbles duets with Tim, to the latter's accompaniment on the beloved guitar. We discover this harmonious pair of strolling musicians in the back yard of a tenement block, when they have just concluded a rendition of "Poor Wandering One," and judging from the shower of pennies they collect, it would seem that they have a flourishing time. With sunset they return "Home" to a modest meal and well-earned repose. But "Singing Bird" is a grafter, and when Tim suggests a dividing of the day's receipts on a 50/50 basis, he is put off with a barefaced swindling proposition. Disgusted with this treatment, Tim decides to cancel the contract, and he makes his get-away in the dead of night, carrying the guitar with him. We see him picked up by a very undesirable acquaintance, taken to a rough saloon, and made to play and sing for the edification of a gang of hoodlums, but as no pecuniary reward is forthcoming, Tiny Tim creeps under the table and awaits his opportunity to escape. While he is under the table, he learns details of a burglary plot, and then hides himself in a big basket, which is to be used for carrying away the booty. The burglars carry Tim into the beautiful mansion they intend to rob, and hurriedly search the house for pelf. Tim's singing alarms them, they return but can see no one. On a repetition of the singing, the burglars are so scared that they escape from the house with all speed. Down comes the master of the mansion, armed with a big gun, and Tim's sweet singing just saves the boy from being shot. We leave the tiny one making explanations and receiving congratulations and presents.

THE SURE TIP (July 24).—Porgie, chafing under his duties as an humble clerk, has taken a flyer in Wall street on a "sure tip." On going home his wife disapproves, and he tells her to "wait until we see by the evening paper how the stock is selling." Now it so happens that their maid, a slattern, cleaning up the library and taking an accumulation of old newspapers out to the ash can in the street, drops a year-old evening newspaper at the foot of the front steps. This paper Porgie, in his excitement, finds and mistakes for the regular evening paper. From its Wall street report he triumphantly reads to his wife that his copper stock he bought that morning at twenty-five cents a share is now selling at $250.00 a share. To his wife's horror he sends the maid out with a dollar to buy "Four Romeo cigars, such as capitalists smoke." While the maid is gone he lies back in his chair and dreams, seeing himself handing in his resignation to his astonished employer; seeing himself the owner of a yacht, an automobile, and giving champagne dinners. But his dream has a rude awakening. On returning with the cigars the maid meets the newsboy delivering the regular evening paper. She takes it to Porgie, and he reads in it, to his horror and astonishment, that his copper company has failed, and finds that the paper quoting the stock at $250 a share is a year old. No Romeo cigars for him! He compels the maid to return the cigars and explain "it was a mistake—that he wanted a five-cent package of plug." When she returns with it Porgie gloomily fills his pipe with the cheap tobacco, swears never to speculate again; and the next morning we see him working at his desk, humble and deferential before his employer.

THE BUG PROFESSOR (July 24).—Professor Germicide becomes demented through too close study. His particular hallucination is that false hair worn by women so profusely nowadays is infected with germs of the black plague from China. He is sent to an asylum, where he creates a sensation by pulling down the nurse's hair, and examining it through a microscope. Later he attempts the same thing with some patients in the courtyard. They chase him. He escapes over the wall. As he is walking down the street he bumps into an old maid. He grabs a "false front" off her head and walks away examining it. He does the same thing to several other women he meets. They all join the old maid in chasing him. By this time his hands are full of false hair—braids, switches, etc., etc. In trying to avoid his pursuers he rushes into a hair dressing shop, interrupting the girl at work. He immediately makes a grab at the new false hair, and continues his examinations. The girl is so scared with his talk about germs in false hair she hands over to him switches, puffs, etc., she is wearing and so is left with just her own small pigtail. At this moment the girl's sweetheart enters, and seeing the girl he once admired, partly for her beautiful hair, he becomes very angry, and tells her she has deceived him. He is about to leave when the professor, who has been looking interestedly at his hair, lifts a toupee from his head, which shows him to be bald. The fellow is embarrassed, and the girl laughs at him as he rushes out, jamming down his hat on his now bald head. Finally the professor is captured by the keepers of the asylum, and the false hair thrown to the crowd of pursuers. They all make a wild scramble for their false hair. The two lovers agree to make allowance for the other's lack of hair and all ends serene.

OH WAT'ER WET DAY (August 1).—Water is all right, provided you don't get too much, at any rate that is now the opinion of Octave Bernaud. Some time ago he fell in love with Rosalie, the only daughter of a widow. The latter was of a militant suffragette type, and when she made up her mind about anything, she either got what she wanted or made the place too hot to hold her. When Rosalie confided that she had the glad eye given her by a handsome young man, and added, with blushes, that she rather liked the gift, her mother started to ask awkward questions. The worthy widow had for some unaccountable reason decided that if she were to be blessed, or cursed, as the case might be, with a son-in-law, he must hold an official position. Rosalie was in despair, but luck was with the couple, and Octave obtained the coveted berth of inspector of village pumps. Octave is not in love with his job, but it is handy to enable him to slope off for a game of billiards. His mother-in-law gets suspicious and announces her intention of acting one day as his assistant. They start out together, but Octave does a guy, leaving the widow to struggle as best she may with a water pipe, from which she has incautiously removed the tap. She is discovered by the police, dragged to the station in a raving condition, and placed in the padded room, where she is subsequently treated to a thorough course of hydrotherapeutics, with the aid of a fire hose. When she is at last removed from durance vile, her ardor is so much cooled down that she quite welcomes her son-in-law's views, be they what they may, and among his very first is a prompt retirement from government service.

THE GIRL I LEFT BEHIND ME (August 1).—Seraphin was a country lad, and he loved a country lass. He came to London Town to make a fortune for his sweet Sally. All would have gone well, were it not for the fact that the poor fellow missed his sweetheart sorely, and at last went to the great Dr. Swankem and bought some medicine, which made him imagine that every lady he saw was his fair Sally. The poor Seraphin has a very unpleasant time of it chasing the mirage of the girl he left behind him.

THE STREETS OF NEW YORK (3 parts—State Rights).—The play takes place in New York City during the panic of 1907. Gideon Bloodgood, a prominent banker, is on the eve of absconding, owing to the affairs of his bank being in a precarious condition. At this juncture relief comes in the person of Captain Fairweather, who has sold out his interests in the Mercantile Marine Company, intending to retire from the active duties of his profession. Fairweather comes to Bloodgood's bank—it is after banking hours, but he prevails upon Bloodgood to accept his money, amounting to $100,000, as a special deposit.

News come that the captain who was to have taken command of Fairweather's ship has met with a severe accident and is unable to sail. His old employers prevail upon Fairweather to make this final trip. He is about to go on board when his attention is attracted by the newsboys shouting "Extra." He buys a paper and is horrified to discover that Bloodgood's bank is in a shaky condition. He rushes back to the bank and demands his money. Bloodgood and his assistant, Badger, who are dividing the money received from the captain, are startled by the entrance of the captain. He demands his money. Bloodgood tells him it is after banking hours, and to come the next day. The intense excitement brings on a fit of apoplexy, and the captain falls dead in the banker's office. They carry the body out on the sidewalk, and circumstances point to the fact that the captain dropped dead in the streets. Bloodgood prevails upon Badger to go out West and the captain's money saved the bank.

Several years elapse and Captain Fairweather's widow and children are in destitute circumstances. The boy, Paul, tries to make a living selling newspapers, and his sister, Lucy, selling flowers. Bloodgood discovers that they are living in one of his tenements and he gives orders to his superintendent to dispossess them. Bloodgood is rolling in luxury and the family whose money he has stolen are reduced practically to beggary. In the meantime, Badger meets with hard luck in the West and is broke. While the captain was lying dead in the office Badger managed to secure the receipt that Bloodgood gave him for the money. An idea comes to Badger to return to New York and sell the receipt to Bloodgood. Badger manages with great difficulty to make his way back to New York City, and arrives at Bloodgood's mansion. With the receipt as a weapon, he makes Bloodgood promise to pay him handsomely.

At this moment, Paul Fairweather, the son, in answer to an advertisement by Bloodgood for a servant on his estate, appears on the scene. Both Bloodgood and Badger discover that he is the son of the man they have robbed, and Bloodgood orders him from the house. Badger goes to a poor tenement, and in the next room by a strange coincident, lives the Fairweather family. Bloodgood follows Badger and discovers his abiding place, and being afraid that Badger will blackmail him owing to the possession of the receipt, determines to set fire to the house and thus destroy the evidence of his crime. Mrs. Fairweather becomes despondent over their unhappy situation and determines to end it all by asphyxiation. Her daughter discovers this and they determine to die together. The fire that Bloodgood started is now making rapid headway and Badger in his room is overcome by the fumes.

An alarm of fire is turned in and the fire department starts for the scene. Paul sees the flames and dashes into the house, resolving to save his family. With the assistance of a fireman, the women are carried out to safety. Passing Badger's room, Paul discovers there is someone inside. Bursting in the door he rescues Badger, who has managed to secure the receipt. Out of gratitude Badger tells Paul the whole story, and forces Bloodgood to make restitution. Badger is about to call in the police and hand his old partner into custody, when Paul, seeing the banker's great

The police are quickly upon the scene, but Fantomas, true to his nom de plume, has vanished. Inspector Robert Juve is the sleuth entrusted to track the mysterious marauder. But before Juve has time to move in the matter of the princess's jewels and cash, another escapade of Fantomas' is thrust upon him to investigate. Lord Beltham is missing. Juve calls on Lady Beltham, and in a man's hat finds the initial "G." With so slight a clue Juve tracks down "Gurn" (none other than the elusive Fantomas), to his lodgings and makes the ghastly discovery of Lord Beltham's dead body in one of "Gurn's" traveling trunks, and a packet of the special Fantomas cards establishes the connection between "Gurn" and Fantomas—they are one and the same man.

Three months elapse. "Gurn" has been tried and condemned to die by the guillotine. Lady Beltham's name has not yet appeared in connection with the case, and the story goes that the murder was the outcome of a violent quarrel between "Gurn" and Beltham, yet she is enamoured of the gentlemanly scoundrel and sets about seeking a method of escape for him. By means of liberal bribes, the aid of Warden Nibet is enlisted and he arranges an interview between the condemned man and Lady Beltham in a house overlooking the prison. That night a new play has been produced by a famous actor, Valgrand, who, acting the role of a condemned felon, adds a realistic touch by making up exactly to resemble "Gurn." At Lady Beltham's invitation, Valgrand, still made up as "Gurn," visits her at 2 A. M., and partaking of drugged coffee, is rendered incapable of action. Warden Nibet returns and takes back his prisoner—no longer "Gurn," alias Fantomas, but the unfortunate Valgrand, who goes through all the terrible preliminaries of a criminal's execution, aye, even to the point of being led to the guillotine, before Inspector Juve makes the startling discovery that Fantomas has once more eluded him. Henceforth it is to be a fight between a clever, scheming, mysterious rogue on one hand, and Inspector Juve, Chief of the Detective Dept. of Paris, on the other.

THE DAY OF JUDGMENT (3 parts—Feature Release).—Through the contemptible powers of a scheming woman secretary, Mr. Bernal, a highly respected citizen and president of a bank, is persuaded to issue the sale of stock in a bogus mining company, even though Lucien Marlow, a mining engineer and fiancé of his daughter, who had been sent out to determine the value of the property, reports that gold is deficient. When Marlow arrives, Claire, the daughter, learns of her father's illegitimate business and goes at once to his office, where a heated argument takes place. This is heard by the editor of a newspaper, and, in order to have this man keep the news from becoming public, Bernal is compelled to pay him hush money at stated intervals. Then the crash comes. Bernard, getting tired of always being obliged to pay, refuses, and forthwith the editor prints the facts. There is a run on the company, and General Delort, a friend of Bernal's, who had been made president of the company, and who had been kept in ignorance of the status of his firm, learning the true state of affairs, kills himself. Before the crowd has time to leave the room where the suicide had been perpetrated, Delort's wife appears and vows that she will trace the ones who inveigled her husband into a swindling game. Bernard and his secretary manage to escape before the maddened crowd reaches them. They make their way to a hotel, where they are discovered a few days later by the Widow Delort, who then places them in the hands of the authorities.

THE LOVE ROMANCE OF SIR FRANCIS DRAKE (3 parts—Feature Release).—Sir Francis Drake's first meeting with the beautiful Elizabeth Syderham takes place outside the gates of the city, on his triumphant return from a foreign expedition. Determined to win her, he forces an entrance to the grounds of the rambling old home of his heart's desire and follows her to a quiet, secluded spot. She does not favor Drake's impetuosity at first, but, relenting, gives him a full red rose as a token of her regard. Another aspirant for Elizabeth's hand is Sir John Doughty. He, a friend of long standing to Elizabeth's father, says he will brook no interference from a "common sailor." Doughty comes to woo Elizabeth, but meets with scant encouragement. Thus embittered, he plans to rid himself of his rival by foul means. Obtaining assistance from roughnecks, he instructs them to lie in wait and assassinate Drake. Meanwhile the latter is summoned upon a special mission by Queen Elizabeth, and he persuades his beloved to secretly wed him before he sails. Everything is arranged. Elizabeth, faithful to her tryst, steals away from her home under the protection of her bold lover. Their footsteps are dogged by Doughty, however, who, at a quiet spot near the quay, signals to his band of assassins and with drawn swords they attack the "common sailor." A sharp, exciting fight ensues. Drake clashes steel with his would-be murderers, one of whom soon falls before his trusty sword. A cowardly and one-sided battle ensues, but eventually Drake wounds another one of his assailants. Mad with rage at this unexpected reverse, Doughty lunges furiously at his hated rival and succeeds in disarming him. Quick as a flash, Drake bodily picks up the wounded and helpless assassin and wards off the onslaught of the other two. Seizing his only opportunity, with mighty strength, he hurls the limp form at Doughty, who, panicstricken at meeting such brave and stout resistance, flees for his life. Drake's ship is reached at last and a picturesque scene is shown of the wedding on board. The ceremony over, Elizabeth returns to her home, unknown to her father, a bride.

On the day of departure, Queen Elizabeth inspects Captain Drake's ship and, to wish him God speed, presents him with a sword, saying, "Take the sword, Master Drake, and we do account that he that striketh at thee, striketh at us." He departs.

Time passes. Sir John Doughty is insistent in his advances. Elizabeth's father favors his suit. Intercepting a letter from Drake to his bride, he descends to further depths of villainy by forging a letter conveying false news, that the venturesome seaman has been killed in a hard encounter on the high seas. Heartbroken by the news, Elizabeth cares not what becomes of her and under pressure from her father at last consents to marry Doughty. The wedding eve approaches, but Drake unexpectedly returns victorious and triumphant and is greeted by the populace with unbounded enthusiasm. Calls of love and loyalty force him to realize that his first duty is to his queen, at whose command he proceeds, with yearning heart, to the Royal Palace. Soon, with pomp and splendor, the magic words are spoken, "Arise, Sir Francis Drake." His honors thick upon him, he can think only of his loved one, and he rushes off to seek her, who, unknown to him, is, with ever deepening despair, preparing for the wedding with Sir John Doughty. Breathless, but happy, he arrives just on time to find the fair Elizabeth about to sacrifice her youth and beauty at her father's behest. Thwarted and humiliated, Sir John is forced to see the all-conquering Drake claim his well-won bride and placate her father before beating a hasty departure.

HIAWATHA (2 parts).—The story is of the famine, and fever lurks among the tents deep in snow. Into Hiawatha's tent come these dread visitors, seizing Minnehaha. Out into the forest rushes Hiawatha, gathering here and there a twig for firewood. Dying Minnehaha calls for her beloved, and in the desolate forest Hiawatha hears this call and hurries homeward. Watched over by her husband and his old grandmother, Nokomis, Minnehaha dies.

Truly wonderful and thrilling is her burial. Covered by a robe of ermine, in his arms, Hiawatha carries his beloved, followed by all the wailing Indians, they push their way through the snow to an Indian bier of tree branches, on this is laid Minnehaha. Funeral services are held and the grave is filled with snow. The Indians leave, and Hiawatha is shown alone, a huge fire sending crimson flames against the sky to light Minnehaha to the "Land of the Hereafter."

IN SEARCH OF BACCHUS.—Ned Patterson, who has been devoting his energies to increasing the importation of wine, is brought home by his pals in spectacular style. His head is wreathed with grape leaves, and he is draped with a white table cloth, on which is painted the legend: "I am Bacchus—God of Wine."

Father finds him in this state, and considers that the joke has gone far enough. So the next morning Ned finds the following note:—

"Inasmuch as you seem wedded to Bacchus, you had better use enclosed check in taking a reformatory honeymoon. Stay until I tell you to return.....Your Father."

Ned is banished to a fishing beach in a "dry" county, and in throwing away his last flask, he encloses the following farewell note:—

"I am sinking with a schooner on the bar. To the finder of this I bequeath the fortune I have left with Bacchus. Ned Patterson."

The flask floats out to sea, where it is caught in a fisher's net. The unsophisticated old fisherman goes to the city to find Mr. Bacchus and claim the fortune, leaving his daughter to tend the nets,—in which Ned is speedily entangled. That she is a good fisher of men is proved by the telegram Ned sends to his father:

"I have divorced Bacchus and married the daughter of a fisherman. What shall I do?"

To which father replies:

"Bring her home and make a living for her."

Motion Picture Rectifier
Set Front View

Better Light for Your Machine

An arc lamp using direct current from a G-E Rectifier gives the finest light that can be obtained. The light is powerful and does not flicker like the light of an alternating current arc.

The G-E Rectifier not only improves the quality of the light, but at the same time it reduces the cost for current, because the rectifier furnishes current at the exact voltage needed by the lamp. Losses in rheostats are therefore entirely eliminated.

WHAT HAVE YOU FOR SALE?

What do you sell your patrons?

Now, just think about it. The more Picture Light you sell your patrons, the more money you will get.

That is the difference between a good and bad showman, between prosperity and bankruptcy.

PICTURE LIGHT means the most that any Screen can reflect. A light that is brilliant, but not blinding, soft but not dull, sharp and no haze and no eye-trouble.

The catalogue of our new SNOW-WHITE finish will explain it to you. Write for one TODAY.

NEW MAJESTIC Scores New Victories! Now It's the Capture of FLORENCE ROBERTS (Herself) in Her Celebrated Version of SAPPHO!

New Majestic must go ahead! New Majestic must do EVEN BIGGER THINGS than before. "SAPPHO," one of the best known and most sensational of plays, is one of those bigger things we are doing—"SAPPHO" WITH HER BEST KNOWN DELINEATOR, FLORENCE ROBERTS. We spent a great deal of money and time before we could induce Miss Roberts to put this on for the camera. We spent a great deal of money and time PUTTING IT ON. Ten thousand dollars would be a conservative and truthful estimate. We wanted the film "Sappho" to surpass the stage one and Miss Roberts, on her part, INSISTED ON IT.

So You Needn't Be Afraid to Invite Comparisons Between the Local BIG THEATRE'S Production of Florence Roberts in "Sappho," and YOUR OWN. The Picture Production is Better.

For the new week, New Majestic announces a COMEDY CARNIVAL—just what you like and what the average patron likes. SUNDAY, JULY 20, it's THE PAJAMA PARADE, wherein some hilarious fun grows out of the attempt of a crowd of college boys to serenade some college girls. TUESDAY, JULY 22, it's THE MIGHTY HUNTER, who isn't so mighty after all, though he is depicted by one of New Majestic's best comedians. SATURDAY, JULY 26, it's JUST SKIRTS and THE ADVENTUROUS GIRLS, a Fred Mace comedy "split" that can be featured. Run all three of these releases and you will understand how New Majestic caused the swamping of "Mutual Service" offices with new business.

A Comedy Carnival in July Makes an Ideal Release Week. Be sure to secure every New Majestic funnyfilm released that week!

MR. KING BAGGOT as "IVANHOE"

IVANHOE

UNIVERSAL DE LUXE

A gorgeous interpretation of the world-famous tale of the wars in Merrie England has just been completed at Chepstow, England. KING BAGGOT, as Ivanhoe; LEAH BAIRD, as Rebecca; EVELYN HOPE, as Rowena, and one thousand extras, under the direction of Herbert Brenon, have produced a most magnificent, gigantic, pictorial reproduction of Sir Walter Scott's most wonderful story.

All the stirring war scenes were staged in and around Chepstow Castle, England; the British Museum ransacked for arms, armor and other properties to make this stupendous production historically correct.

Excitement and romance are so cleverly interwoven that there is not a dull moment from start to finish.

Jo Hibbard's Claim

1 reel, August 6

Jo Hibbard becomes a "bad man," but his career is short. After his death his old mother comes to meet him, ignorant of what has occurred. The miners tell her Jo was killed in an accident at the mine, and secretly make a collection among themselves, presenting her with a considerable sum which they make her believe was left by Jo.

A War Time Mother's Sacrifice

2 reels, July 30

A sensational war story, replete with thrills and sensations. A young Southerner becomes entangled in the clutches of a Northern spy, who makes him believe he is a murderer. He thus forces information from the Southern youth. The boy's father learns of this through the arrest of the spy. The boy commits suicide on the eve of a great battle, and his mother places his dead body among a heap of dead soldiers the following day, making it appear that he died a hero. The father finds his son, and thinks the spy—who has escaped—lied, and that his son was brave and honorable.

Prof. Bean's Removal

1 reel, August 7

Prof. Bean and his daughter are enthusiastic cornetists, to the distress of the neighbors. Their efforts to have the noise stopped meets with no success, as Prof. Bean and Mabel put them all to rout. The landlord takes a hand, accompanied by police, but Prof. Bean and his trusty gun convinces them that discretion is the better part of valor. The other tenants threaten to move, and in desperation the landlord places the house on automobile trucks and moves it away in the dead of night. The Professor and Mabel are awakened by being thrown out of their beds by the jolting of the house and, rushing to the door, find themselves moving rapidly down the street.

Summer Time Selections

WHOLESOME SEASONABLE SENSATIONAL

The Third Annual M. P. E. L. Convention is a thing of the past, with pleasant memory freighted with fraternity, desirable for quickening, bettering the business. Honors are even and everybody is happy. But now it is back to work after play-time, and the passengers of "the ship of laziness on the sea of dreams" are out of sight, while the hustlers are humping to the front. One way to get to the front—one way to keep to the front—is to secure the Selig line, and make it a popular permanency. Summer finds no let-up in the merit of its output, in the variety of its interest, in the attractiveness of its product.

August 4th. "THE GRANITE DOLLS." In the wonderland of Arizona. On the same reel with the amusing pictorial version of "The Devil and Tom Walker."

August 5th. "A MANSION OF MISERY." Tapestried walls may a prison make, for the home is where the heart is. A thrilling drama of throbbing heart interest.

August 6th. "THE STOLEN MOCCASINS." A thrilling play with a heroic rescue. An episode of the wilder West.

August 7th. "THE GALLOPING ROMEO." A breezy Western story—a good health comedy. On the same reel with "The Grocer's Revenge." An amusing episode of a stingy man, who is made to "loosen" through the aid of butter as a lubricant.

August 8th. "MISS ARABIAN NIGHTS." An interesting comedy drama, full of fine sentiment and wholesome surprises.

Facts and Comments

MUCH has been said, and much more might be said, about overloaded programs. The feeling seems to be general among exhibitors that programs are too long and the price of admission too little. We do not believe that any hard-and-fast lines can be laid down for the proper size of a program. It all depends on the ability of the exhibitor to balance his program and give it the right proportion of variety. One exhibitor may be able to make a six-reel program seem short and delightful, while another man may crowd a load of dullness into three reels. The latter program will be the shorter in the matter of the reels actually shown, but it will seem much longer than the interesting and varied program of six reels. The feature has become the backbone of the present-day program. Striking an average of fifty features, we will find the ordinary length of a feature considerably in excess of two thousand feet. The exhibitor whose offering consists of a three-reel entertainment has some difficulty in providing a proper balance for such a program. Unless his feature is good and holds the interest of his audience from start to finish, it is a distinct burden and much depends on his other reels. Unless the latter are exceptionally meritorious, the program, though but four reels long, is tedious and tiresome. On the other hand, if his feature is strong and interesting and is run without long intermissions, an addition of two or even three fairly good reels will be entirely welcome to his audience.

The vital question involved is not the length of the program, but the price of admission. A first class program of five or six reels, with a real feature included, is worth more than ten cents. The poorest theaters in the poorest countries of Europe get ten cents and more for a mediocre program. It is preposterous to say that Americans are unwilling to pay a good price for a good show. Where all the elements of a good entertainment are present, such as good music, good projection, competent management and well-selected pictures, nothing less ought to be charged than twenty-five cents, with a goodly number of reserved seats at a higher price. Such a show need fear no competition from the cheaper show around the corner intended for a different class of patrons. Eventually the length and quality of the program will bring a just price of admission. There will always be amateurs in the business who imagine the quick road to prosperity lies in showing much and charging little. These men will, to a limited extent, hurt others, but they will always hurt themselves most.

WE can quite understand, and to a certain extent sympathize with, the "old showman's" plea that loud and lurid paper is needed to get the public inside. The excuse that the promise of horrors held out in the lobby is not fulfilled on the screen, has a certain air of plausibility about it. We feel very sure, however, that the methods of the old days are antiquated and that the exhibitor of motion pictures is or ought to be a new kind of showman working with tools of his own. A large and lurid poster bedaubed with a gruesome picture has no longer the drawing power it had twenty and thirty years ago. Such posters have lost in drawing power and have gained in repelling power. The number of people to whom the lurid poster is the same as a barred gate is very much larger today than it ever was before. The show business has advanced with the world in general, and the truest exponent of the modern amusement standard is the exhibitor of motion pictures. That's why he is the first to discard lurid and exaggerated methods of advertising.

* * *

QUITE a number of exhibitors have been heard lately to complain of the "in and out" and "up and down" performances of certain feature companies. A splendid feature is put forth today and a reputation is achieved. The next feature comes and is absolutely wanting in merit. The producers have trusted to their reputation to cover glaring defects of the second or third feature. It is a poor way of doing business, injurious both to exhibitor and to producer. While the immediate loss falls on the trustful exhibitor, it is quite certain that a severe loss will likewise be sustained by the producer. His products will be viewed with suspicion and he will find too late and to his cost that it is much easier to establish a reputation than to lose and regain one.

Two canons in England have broken forth into lamentations about the path of ruin which the motion picture leaves behind. One canon says it destroys the child, while the other, in an even greater access of pessimism, thinks it will destroy the entire race. We respectfully suggest that they communicate with our own Brooklyn Canon Chase and hold a mass meeting in imitation of the famous three tailors of Tooley Street.

Taxing Education

By W. Stephen Bush

A PROBLEM with which the recent National Convention of exhibitors might have concerned itself to the great advantage of the industry at large is the threatened taxation of moving picture theaters. There is an obvious distinction between the granting of a license and the imposition of a tax. From time immemorial a fee has been exacted for the privilege of conducting a place of amusement. This has always been looked upon as a necessary and justifiable regulation. Persons who were desirous of keeping a place of amusement have all the more willingly submitted to the payment of a license, because the latter conferred certain rights or privileges.

We do not believe in the justice of any licensing system as applied to motion pictures. Time was when the licensing of the press was recognized as one of the legitimate and necessary functions of the State. It has taken more than three centuries to establish the liberty of the press from governmental regulation of any kind. We feel confident that the motion picture will be free and independent of any licensing control on the part of the government in much less than a decade. The complete enfranchisement of the motion picture is only a matter of time. Even at this time there are hundreds and thousands of intelligent men and women who realize that the picture is fully as useful as the book and the newspaper, and that the privileges bestowed upon the printing press ought to be shared in the fullest measure by the kinematograph. Persistent agitation and growing enlightenment will do away with the licensing system. Our emancipation will come slowly but surely, and no violent changes will be necessary.

A foe more dangerous than the present licensing system is the growing desire of legislators to impose special taxes upon the motion picture. Here is an evil that must be faced at once. Every independent political community, from the village to the State, has the power to tax places of amusement. It is entirely possible to have the motion picture exhibitor oppressed by special and separate taxes imposed by the town, the county and the State. Now we are not disposed to deny that the place of amusement is a fair subject for taxation. The presumption of the lawgiver is that the man who wants to go to a theater is indulging in a luxury, and luxury is best able to bear taxation. It would, however, be wrong in fact and unjust in practise to class the motion picture theater as such a place of amusement. The visit to the motion picture theater is not a luxury or a sign of bursting wealth in the visitor. Thus one great reason for taxing the motion picture in addition to the levy of a general license is disposed of.

The motion picture theater, however, bases its claim to be exempted from the oppressive taxes upon the educational character of its entertainment. This privilege of exemption from special taxes has been recognized by the government of Italy, which has given its support to a measure providing that all exhibitions of an educational character are not to be touched by the new tax about to be imposed on moving picture houses. Nor is the definition of the word "educational" in the proposed statute narrowed down to its strict and primary sense. Any program which consists of pictures with an educational value is entitled to the exemption. It is reasonable to say that every picture has an educational value with the exception of the farce comedies and the cheap melodrama. A good drama dealing in a forcible way with social or ethical problems is possessed of a high educational value. It need not necessarily point out a moral or teach a lesson, if it calls attention to some striking features in our modern life and if it makes the spectator think it has a distinct educational value. The world has been taught much of its wisdom by the playwrights. Screen adaptations of the great masters of fiction and poetry and the drama have given to the millions what before the invention of kinematography had been the property of but a chosen few.

It is plain, therefore, that the motion picture theater is to a very large extent an educational theater. It differs from the speaking stage in the variety of its entertainment, in the price of admission, in the size of its audience. All these facts ought to make for the exemption of the motion picture theaters from any kind of taxation. We might just as well try to tax the school and the church and the library. In all ages except the dark ages, and in all countries except Russia, the State has encouraged education. This country of ours owes not a little of her wealth and strength and national spirit to its public schools and to its efforts to help education and to spread knowledge as widely as possible. In this respect, at least, American statesmanship has made no mistakes. It is inconceivable that it will tax the greatest educational force in the world today.

It is not enough, however, to fortify ourselves with these arguments and to applaud them. We must use them where they will do the most good. Taxation is inclined to follow the lines of least resistance. If exhibitors sit down idly, the tax gatherer will find them nodding. Each State organization should be on the alert in this matter and watch every effort of the legislators, whether in city, county or State. They must be prepared to fight. Wherever the issue is sharply defined and the educational value of the picture pointed out, the victory is very likely to be with the exhibitors. Happily this is a free country, governed by public opinion. In other countries, where the spirit of the government is autocratic, whatever its form may be, the tax gatherer stands in the box-office, counts the cash and takes away ten or twenty per cent., and sometimes even more. If exhibitors here do not want to play percentage with the government after this annoying and confiscatory fashion, they must put their shoulders to the wheel and agitate for the exemption of the motion picture theater on the grounds hastily set forth in this article and on many other grounds which will occur to every thinking mind.

Here is a splendid chance for the National League to give a practical demonstration of its usefulness. Let it furnish the exhibitor with proper literature, which need not be voluminous or expensive. No more is necessary than an array of good and persuasive arguments and hints as to the best and most effective methods of agitation.

I believe that the different State organizations will be quite willing and able to do the rest. I have no doubt that they will know how to enlist the aid of the press, which has always and everywhere been the friend of education. It will be in the power of each single exhibitor to impress his audience in favor of any legislation for the benefit of educational programs. He can work through his screen or through personal appeal. The number of exhibitors who are on good enough personal terms with their patrons to do this effectively is uncommonly large. This agitation cannot begin too soon, for the subject is of the highest importance, both to the exhibitor and to the industry at large.

Picture Sense

By Louis Reeves Harrison

THERE is a certain likeness between advertising placards, such as are placed in front of motion-picture theaters, and the half-tone illustrations which accompany the printed review of an important release—the ostensible purpose of both being to excite curiosity or to quicken interest in the whole product of which they represent a part. Both are made from what is distinguished in this business as "still" pictures, and it cannot be said that the majority of them err on the side of portraying action, or even suggesting such a thing. They fall down as hard as the average screen presentation from lack of a convincing punch.

Among still pictures examined at the various studios for the purpose of illustrating reviews I find very few that mean anything. In the best studios there is always a fine camera ready during last rehearsals, after the drama is acted or during its movement—what is lacking is the eye of an artist. There is little unity in the composition, and it is so dull or so complicated that it conveys nothing. It should be intelligible at a glance. Few will spend time to unravel the significance of such a photograph or examine it in detail, hence it should have what might be called an epigrammatic snap to it, something interesting and happily represented, to be of poster or illustrative value.

In the composite production of moving pictures two important factors are among the last to attract recognition—genius in the scenario and picture sense. The stimulus to production, that of making money, very naturally attracted those of commercial instinct rather than of artistic perception, but now that quality is beginning to count and those who attend the photoplay houses are beginning to weary of what is without originality or marked individuality; there is an audible call for the finer intelligence of the well-informed. Competition promises to open the field to those capable of creating great screen presentations and those both gifted and trained to set them forth in impressive and beautiful form. There must be something of live interest to portray, and the eye of an artist will be found a tremendous factor in its portrayal. Listen for a moment to what a great critic has to say of Millet's painting, "The Sower":

"In the twilight sky, as in the deep-shadowed foreground, we see that the Sower works late; in the sweat and dust on his face and the hat crowded over his brow we see that he is weary of toil; in the serious eyes looking out from their deep sockets we see the severity of his fate; yet the strong foot does not flinch, the swinging arm does not falter, the parched lips do not murmur. His life is a struggle for bare existence, a battling ground against odds, but how noble the struggle! A type of thousands in the humble walks of life, bearing patiently the burdens laid upon him, though the world has long neglected him, and fame has never honored him, yet he is no less a man, a brave man, a hero."

Here is past, present and future without titular explanation. It is a picture felt by thousands who could not even outline their impressions. It is a powerful appeal, not because it is theatrical, but because it is intensely human. An artist perceives where most of us dimly glimpse character revelation. No attempt need be made in the ordinary still picture to give a full realization of the story told, but it should at least contain a suggestive impression of what is to be more fully presented on the screen, and in order to do that it must be effectively composed.

There is always one central point of interest—there could not very well be two or more—and that central point constitutes the apex of dramatic action. I once favorably reviewed a photodrama in which an accomplished actress in the leading role so dominated every scene in which she appeared that all other movements converged upon the wondrous grace of her own. She held enthralled attention of the eye so that other critics were inclined to define her support as decidedly inferior. There was really nothing the matter with the support she received, but there was so much to delight the mind in her flow of movement and in her forcible presentation of all that was passing in her thoughts that she dwarfed all other action as well as scenic effect—she was one continual center of interest.

The woman was a veritable artist. Through instinct or training, or both, every motion of her body and limbs led to an attitude of significance. She possessed picture sense to such a marked degree that her performance was a constant and charmingly varied character revelation. She may not have been responsible for choice of backgrounds and groupings in the pictured drama, but her artistic sensibilities overcame the prescribed limits of small and large scope in the portrayal so effectively as to transport us from the world we were living in to that in which she was making believe. The unyielding "V" in which moving pictures are taken was apparently transformed by picture sense from a disadvantage to a blessing.

Now that the screen presentation bids fair to become as much a question of psychology as of photography, that it is progressing from an interpretation of literature to that of human nature, it should not recede behind the frame of artificiality, a freakish form of cheap entertainment, because it seems ultimately destined to rouse the curiosity and interest of cultivated people quite as well as of minds primitive. It can always appeal to the latter, no matter how beautiful or profound the idea involved, because photographic success depends largely upon the soul through the eyes without any mystifying intervention of words.

In very simple illustration, it is more effective to point to the door than to tell a man to get out, to touch the lips with one finger than to drag a man across the stage and shout, "Be silent" so that every one in the house can hear it. The Photoplaywright of creative imagination will indicate what the actor is to do rather than to say, and it will be up to the actor to interpret in motion and attitude as well as in gestural and facial expression and give the character forcible personality besides. Still all may fail unless the director is equipped with what is here defined as picture sense.

The chaotic effect of mediocre pictures is due to a lack of this sense, the ability to give proper place to persons, objects, lights and even colors when they come to be used. The production of an artist-director will not only reveal natural beauties but will unite these to the poetic, romantic or dramatic ideas of the playwright instead of, as at present, rarely setting forth either in form to delight the spectator.

A FRAUD ON VITAGRAPH.

Information has been given the Vitagraph Company that a young man named Joseph Leclerc is going about representing himself as a camera man in the employ of that company for the purpose of securing favors. The Vitagraph Company requests the Moving Picture World to advise its readers and the trade that no such person is in its employ and that all should beware of him. When last heard from Leclerc was in Canada.

A Trio of Fine Vitagraphs.

"Under the Daisies," Two-Reel; "The Flirt" and "Better Days."

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

IT is an unusual experience for the critic to find more than one worthy production at a studio exhibition, and he is only too glad to find that one good enough for a special review. To come upon three is intellectually intoxicating. It happened this way. While waiting for a private showing of "Under the Daisies," two-reel feature, I sat watching Mr. Blackton's final and severely critical inspection of some one-reel pictures and became so strongly attracted by two of them that I inclined to use them instead of the feature. As the latter was ready, however, I decided to have a look at it and found myself more deeply interested than ever. It will certainly hold the attention of an audience throughout, and all three have modern motives, fine exposition and a punch.

"Better Days."

"Better Days" is one of those intensely human plays mislabled "simple" because nothing extravagant is done. The motive in it is one of the most beautiful known to enlightened people, a warm and impulsive act of kindness springing straight from the hearts of those who had reason to let their suspicions run away with their judgment. Such generous acts are done by thousands—they help materially to make the world habitable for those whose wandering steps lead them into dark paths—yet I heard a spectator whose face I could not see express a self-revealing doubt if there was any such milk of charity in the human breast. The spectator has a lot to learn before he can aspire to sit in judgment on his own kind.

A little boy, a real one, a splendid little fellow, chuck full of vigor, is the central figure, and as the part is taken by a Master Sidney Cummings, a newcomer, I take pleasure in saying that he is one of the most attractive tiny replicas of manhood I have ever seen on the screen. Sidney is left to play with his bucket and shovel and makes the acquaintance of a poor, old outcast, whose one tendril of affection is the memory of just such a child he has lost. The action is gently led to the little fellow's playroom, where the old man's pent up tenderness is poured out in amusing frolics with his fascinating little companion. His presence in the house is logically shown to be a menacing one, though without real intention of evil, and he is on the edge of suffering undeserved punishment when the situation is saved by all that is sweet in him and the boy, and he is sent on his way rejoicing. The entire atmosphere of this production is exquisitely natural and refined.

"The Flirt."

Quite as natural and much more artistic is the story of a volatile and giddy, young wife given to discorded fancies and dangerous conduct in "The Flirt," very decidedly of to-day. Much in the delightful personality of Miss Dorothy Kelly seems to eminently qualify her for the tilte role. She makes it a fascinating one. We can not blame her husband, in this case the versatile Mr. Humphrey, for loving her in man's own way, loving himself first, but she is so intensely feminine, so susceptible to the influence of other interesting men than her husband, so delighted by their artful appeals to her almost artless and childlike vanity, that the characterization is a spell-binder. She engages in amatory pastime as though it was the object of her life.

No question is involved as to whether or not married men make good husbands. Humphrey makes a considerate and highly intelligent one, such as may be found in real life rather than on the stage. He treats his capricious and altogether charming young wife with generosity and thoughtful appreciation, with a great deal of large-minded toleration of her faults up to a certain point, and then he asserts his manhood in a scene of great strategy and power. A very few details of this high scene are forced, but they are excusable in view of the effect and lesson conveyed. He traps his wife and the pretentious lover where the former must be branded with ignominy or the latter with a crime that will destroy his career. The situation is well devised and worked out with an unusual amount of high tension. He forgives neither and places both under eternal obligations by a masterly stroke, then deftly builds the foundation for a finer relation with "the flirt" by steadying her weak character in the end. The settings if this photodrama are exceptionally appropriate and pleasing to the eye, additional evidence that the production is a work of art.

"Under the Daisies."

There are many things to admire beside settings and acting in the feature play "Under the Daisies," and perhaps the foremost is the affecting poem on which it is based. It chiefly concerns the bad conduct of a dramatic critic—it is about time his villainy is shown up on the screen—who starts on his downward path by cynical observations on the agonizing efforts of an unsuccessful playwright.. As nearly all well-known dramatists of to-day have found their way into one of the most trying of professions through channels of criticism, the selective taste of one serving to determine how much and what kind of creative work of the other will be suited to the tastes of a mixed audience, the playwright in this case is of a theatrical kind, one who uses a pen or pencil in writing and gazes at vacancy in search of inspiration. A very large proportion of authors in real life do nothing of the kind. Perhaps that is why the dramatist in the story failed to make a hit.

The critic in this case receives a large conditional inheritance at the age of thirty—he gets it if he does not wed before the age of thirty-five. The first logical consequence of this ban on his freedom of action is his falling in love with a country girl first seen in a field of daisies. He lures her to the city under promise of marriage but defers that formality after arrival for obvious reasons. When the time comes for him to keep his promise, he has enjoyed the sweetness of the girl's youth and it has lost flavor. He discards her in a beautiful and touching scene at the end of the first reel.

The girl drags wearily back home, sits down among the "daisies for remembrance" and writes her last letter to the man who elected to destroy all that was left of her bright dream and her final communication is directed by force of circumstances into the hands of the playwright. He reads that,

"Thus forever throughout the world,
  "In love a sorrow proving,
"There's many a sad, sad thing in life,
  "But the saddest of all is loving."

He displays sagacity in using this information and writes a successful play on the theme of the unfortunate girl's love. The critic sees it and perceives for the first time the ignominious role he has performed, or possibly realizes that he has lost a valuable asset in the death of a woman's devotion, and the dramatist he criticized to the latter's ultimate advantage becomes an unconscious and indirect instrument of retaliation.

The ends of justice may be served so far as the critic's conduct towards the girl is concerned, but there is some cloudiness about the ends served between man and man. Appearances strongly indicate that the dramatist was theorizing his way to continued failure when the critic drove him to actual life for a theme and its presentation. Then, while the actor may dearly hate a critic, the man who does creative intellectual work is usually modest enough and wise enough to seek from critical sources such information as may better his product. The honest truth is that the supposed antagonism between playwrights and critics is a myth. Men of mark in both professions have usually worked in both; there exists a decided readiness among them to assist one another; one of the most agreeable phases of literary and critical work is a cordiality and helpfulness of relation. If there is any real enmity it is that of the "perfesh" for any and all critics.

Scene from "Under the Daisies" (Vitagraph).

On this account—I usually praise actors—I will not let the gentleman who impersonated an author in this play know how little he looked like a man occupied in tremendous intellectual concentration, such as is required by this review, nor the gentleman who impersonated a critic that it is not the proper thing to give out an opinion by facial expression or otherwise in advance of publication, because both of these actors are entirely capable of doing anything they understand, capable of doing it so well that they do not hesitate to admit it. If, by way of creative criticism, I could benefit other actors by a few suggestions, I would show how the interpreters of this play might have made it more effective, but as performers rarely have time to read anything that does not pertain directly to themselves my helpful spirit would be dissipated on desert air.

No one who has not been long engaged in critical and creative work, who has been heartsick hundreds of times over weak, stale, pointless, forced, artificial, theatrical productions, the other fellow's or his own, can appreciate what a pleasure it was for me to watch three interesting screen presentations in succession. Work that used to be spiritless toil is now becoming a pleasure, thanks to the intelligence and good taste of such leaders in production as the Vitagraph company.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

Miss Mary Charleson, of the Vitagraph Players, has recently come East from the western studios and is now at the Vitagraph studios in Brooklyn. She is staying with her aunt, Mrs. Kate Price, at her home at Brighton Beach. Miss Charleson will be seen soon in a two-part feature, "The Intruder," the first play in which she has taken part since leaving the West.

Wilfrid North, the well-known Vitagraph director, is a golf enthusiast of the most pronounced type. He was recently playing at Lenox, Mass., where he gave a splendid demonstration of the difficult points of the game. He is a frequent visitor to Dunwoodie, New York, and is the holder of three golf cups given by the Dunwoodie Golf Club.

The advantage of types in motion pictures was very positively emphasized during the production of the Vitagraph Life Portrayal, "The Curse of the Golden Land." Miss Florence Radinoff, who impersonates the wife of the Russian immigrant, "Wolf Salzman," was obliged, in the performance of her part, to take her little boy through some of the crowded streets of the Hebrew quarters of New York City. She was frequently stopped on her way by the Russian Hebrews of the district and asked whom she was looking for or where she was going. Fortunately, Miss Radinoff, who was formerly a Russian actress of note, was able to speak the Russian tongue and allayed their fears that she might be lost in a strange country, by stating clearly, she knew exactly where she was going and would not need their services in guiding her to her destination. They were so eager to show their readiness to help one of their own country people, they asked her when she had landed, where her husband was and whether she had friends here. She convinced them by her intelligent answers that she was well able to care for herself. She never betrayed who she was or the nature of her business and there was no knowledge of her real identity, so perfect was her make-up and glib was her tongue. The point that this incident enforces is, that the selection of the right type of player for the right character, is very important. It carries conviction to an audience, making them feel that they are witnessing a real insight into the life of those whom the story and the picture, "The Curse of the Golden Land," concern.

Miss Ada Gifford, one of the latest additions to the Vitagraph Stock Company, is a well known favorite in many stage productions. She joined the Vitagraph players six weeks ago and already her personality has ingratiated itself upon the screen in a very marked way.

BOOKING "FROM THE MANGER TO THE CROSS."

Harry F. Grelle, of Dersheimer & Grelle, Pittsburgh, Pa., was a caller at the office of the Moving Picture World during convention week. His firm has secured the Pennsylvania rights for the Kalem feature "From the Manger to the Cross" and is now arranging bookings for exhibitions to begin in the early fall.

"The Higher Justice"

A Reliance Two-Part Feature with Good Situations and Plenty of Action.

H. C. Judson.

FORREST HALSEY, the author of "The Higher Justice," has little liking for the dull and slow. This, like many of his other pictures, and the Reliance people have found it profitable to use a good deal of his work, will be far more likely to seem less than two thousand feet to the spectator than more. It is not quite up to his best; for it lacks the intellectual interest of one or two of his; but it does show the wakeful liveliness of mind and the interest in his own picture that makes situations come readily so that there is no padding and no need of it.

The picture's central theme is a discussion of two very closely related facts of human experience and these are set forth in the lives of two half brothers. One brother is born of a woman of good instincts, who has been deceived by a fake marriage; he is illegitimate and has been brought up on a farm, healthily. The other, his half brother, is legitimate, but has had the misfortune of being brought up by his father.

Scene from "The Higher Justice" (Reliance).

At the climax, all three are brought together in a dramatic scene. The illegitimate son has been elected district attorney. The other son has lived a foolish life and, in an ungovernable fit of rage, has killed a man. The district attorney makes an able prosecution and the jury goes out to consider the case. Here, and not very strongly from a dramatic viewpoint, the father tries to bribe the district attorney. Was it not too late at that time after the youth had confessed? But the mother enters the lawyer's office and recognizes her betrayer so that, now, the father knows that he is talking to his son and tells the attorney, who has refused the bribe, that he is working to convict his own brother. We now have a strong speech to the court, given on the return of the jury before the verdict has been announced, and in this the lawyer accuses the old man of being the real culprit rather than the weakling whom he has ruined. At this juncture, the culprit falls dead at his father's feet, and this outcome, while dramatically of some value, does not appeal to the mind. It is emotional, but it keeps the picture from arriving at a definite and clear-cut conclusion. The result is therefore not instructive.

As an offering, the picture has high quality; it interests strongly. In the early part of the story, the author, in shaping its course, presents many situations, each of which would be big and substantial enough to furnish "the big scene" of an ordinary offering. Some of these scenes, by contrast, are a bit weak; but the poorest of them carries its part of the story and is hurried away into the forgotten past by the swift growth of the action.

In giving the "punch" to these situations and scenes, the work of the players counts greatly. As the picture opens, we find Earle Talbot playing the part of an unscrupulous college youth who meets Irene Hunt, as an unsophisticated country girl. Her father drives him off the farm and there is a runaway marriage, or the girl thinks it is. So far, we watch only in hope; but when the boy's father learns that he has been absent from college and finds him with the girl, our attention is caught and held to the end. The scene of this meeting of father and young people is finely acted. The boy is made a perfect cad in his repudiation of the girl before the father; one wants to hiss him. Following, come the contrasting pictures of the rich youth's marriage to a society woman and of the poor young mother's plight. The society scenes are not so natural as the farm scenes; but the producer, Oscar Apfel, has made the story most smooth. The things that happen are convincing even when, only once in a while, the acting seems unnatural. As the boys grow up, Irving Cummings takes the role of the poor lad and makes a very impressive district attorney, while Harry Spingler takes the other boy. It is a rather hard role, but he carries it well. He is especially strong in the scene in which he kills the foolishly brutal man who tantalizes him, even in our eyes, almost beyond endurance. The act is wholly unpremeditated, is done in a blind wrath and at its most insane moment, and seems, for a second, almost worthy, so strongly do we sympathize with him just then.

The outcome of the story can be foreseen too early, though it remains alive and interesting. We know that the character who is to be "brought to book" is the old father, the man who had so wronged the girl of the opening scenes, and when the son commits the crime and the other son has been elected district attorney, we suspect that the father will make some sort of plea and that he will be answered worthily. To reach what is called poetic justice, the guilty son had either to be acquitted or die, as he did. We believe poetic justice is not needed and that the people don't want it; but prefer actual life and think this picture would have been stronger if the son had suffered for his crime by going to prison for a long term and the father, after the papers had printed the district attorney's scathing speech, had been despised by all the world. Harking back to the early part of the story, we find another weak point that lessened the value of the ending. Once, when the father came in to remonstrate with his son for his fast living, the son asks him, "What kick have you got—I'm a chip of the old block." The father seems pleased with this and drinks a glass of wine with him. It was strange so soon after a remonstrance, and shows the father as incapable of the suffering that is his due at the end of the story. A man has to have some brains in order to be able to suffer.

Scene from "The Higher Justice" (Reliance).

There is much that is lovely in the photography and in the scenes. One among many pleasing scenes is that in which the poor mother is seen working in a field with her son, and the scene following gives a taste of the human quality of the offering. For the rich man's automobile has broken down just outside and the two half brothers play migs, but don't know each other.

NEW INDIANAPOLIS CONCERN.

Incorporation papers have been filed by the Hyde Park Amusement Company with the Secretary of State of Indiana. The company will have its headquarters in Indianapolis and expects to open a high-class picture theater at Illinois and 30th Streets, that city, about September 1. The incorporators are E. Hardy Linwood, president; Alvin C. Ostermeyer, vice-president; Henry S. Davidson, secretary and treasurer. It is the purpose of the company to build and operate other houses as rapidly as sites can be obtained and buildings completed.

Making "Ivanhoe" in England.

The Filming of the Great Scott Classic Receives Much Attention in the British Press.

THE making of Scott's "Ivanhoe" in England by the representatives of the Universal Film Company, of this city, aroused a great deal of attention in the press of Great Britain. The interest was not confined to the trade papers, but extended to the general press as well. A writer on the Daily Express of London went so far as to obtain an opportunity to appear in the picture in order that he might the better describe the stirring events about the old walls of Chepstow Castle. The castle, by the way, had been leased for a month by Herbert Brenon, director for the Imp, under the brand of which the film is now being shown in England. It will be regularly released there September 11. Mr. Brenon, besides directing the picture, played the role of Isaac of York. King Baggot, the leading man of the Imp Company, played Ivanhoe. Arthur Scott Craven was King Richard. Miss Leah Baird, who went to England for the purpose of playing opposite Mr. Baggot, was Rebecca. The role of Lady Rowena was sustained by Miss Evelyn Hope, an English actress. Mr. Calvert was Gurth; Mr. Norman, Wamba, and Mr. Bosco, Cedric. It is said that the picture will be released in the United States some time during September.

During the making of the picture the natives of the town of Chepstow lost interest in all the ordinary things of life. According to one writer, so anxious were the townspeople for the success of the filming of the great story that they would have waited upon the Duke of Beaufort to ask that Director Brenon be given permission to do anything he liked with the castle and its grounds, even if it had been necessary to destroy the castle in the final onslaught. The castle, by the way, is a famous fortress of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. It has high walls and massive, cylindrical towers. There are four interior courts. The town is situated on the River Wye, in Monmouthshire, thirteen miles northwest of Bristol. The population is about 3,500.

It was in the week beginning June 23 that most of the scenes were taken. The big work came on Friday and Saturday, however. It is to these days that the writers devote their attention. Low Warren in the Kinematograph and Lantern Weekly thus describes the scenes about the castle:

"Betimes next morning the serious business of the day commenced. It was a wonderful experience. Within and without the castle walls was gathered a strange and motley crowd. Red Cross Knights in shining suits of steel mail, astride gaily caparisoned horses; swarthy Saracens of evil mien; courtly knights of the shire, bearing great cross-handled swords; goodly friars, in gray habit, and woodmen of Robin Hood's band in green, each armed with bow and arrow. Here a king and there a banner bearer; hundreds of fighting men, serfs, vassals, and horses. All the colors of the rainbow seemed to move in kaleidoscopic confusion upon the grassy sward. Overhead an enormous walnut tree, said to be hundreds of years old, and without its peer for size, which is such that its spreading branches seem to shade one-half the great quadrangle. On all sides the massive gray walls of the once great castle of Richard de Clare, Earl of Pembroke—better known in the pages of history as Strongbow. Every coign of vantage occupied. The good people of Chepstow seemed to be there to a man; and as the whole population was there so were the police!

"In the midst of this great throng stood a man in his shirtsleeves, and upon his words centered the attention of all the gaily dressed crowd. Here was the mainspring of all movement—the directing brain of this vast army, at whose word they moved in this direction and that, and performed most wondrous valiant deeds. The man in the shirtsleeves was Herbert Brenon, upon whose shoulders rested the responsibility of producing a great silent drama, at which picture theatergoers of two continents will marvel when they see it upon the screen. At a whistle's blow, down surged the fleeing army with Ivanhoe and his retainers at their heels. And what a handsome figure the Red Cross Knight looked in his suit of chain armor, as he led his men to victory. Time and again was this rush rehearsed before Mr. Brenon was satisfied that all was as it should be. And then what a sight! What a lesson in handling crowds. In all my experience of stage production—and it is fairly wide—never have I seen a crowd better handled. It was truly marvelous how this man in his shirt-sleeves seemed to 'lift' this rushing, shouting horde of men. He literally made them 'see red' as they flew helter-skelter after the retreating enemy. It made a magnificent picture."

This is from the Cinematograph Exhibitors' Mail:

"What a wonderfully perfect actor is Mr. King Baggot, and what an enormous amount of energy he puts into his work. He seems to inspire the rest of the company whenever he is in the picture, with the result that they put much more force into their work than they would otherwise deem necessary. He takes his work completely to heart, and this past week I am sure he has forgotten that he is King Baggot, the best film actor in the world—and has been eating, drinking, sleeping and working as if he were the very Ivanhoe of centuries ago come to life again to pay homage to his king and to fight and win the hand of the fair Lady Rowena."

Assault on Castle as Reproduced at Chepstow.

The special correspondent of the London Daily Express, writing Friday night, said:

"We have carried Chepstow Castle at the sword's point, just as I foretold last Wednesday, and as I write half of Ivanhoe's green-coated foresters are drinking pints at the Tuns Tavern to celebrate the victory. The other half are getting their wounds dressed at a local surgery. As for Brian de Bois Guilbert and his gang of Normans, they will know better next time than to carry off a couple of nice girls like Rebecca and Rowena. Poor old Brian had not a dog's chance when we pikemen thought about those two girls languishing in a damp dungeon. We gripped our weapons as grimly as Ivanhoe stood up in his stirrups and pointed the way with his sword. There was no holding us, but when Mr. Brenon stood beside the camera and bellowed through a megaphone, 'Fight, like blazes, boys, and there's sandwiches and beer when you get inside'—well, that was just about hte point when we began to see red. Both Ivanhoe's ranks and the Normans were recruited at five shillings a day from the local ironworks, which closed down for the battle, and some of these blacksmiths and riveters got a great swing on sword or battleaxe when they were in the thick of the scrimmage. Quite a lot of old scores were settled in front of the Norman gateway this afternoon."

GENERAL FILM EXTENDING OUTPUT.

To Issue Eight Multiple Reels Each Week—There Will Be Three on Fridays.

When the new schedule of the General Film gets into full swing, some time along the latter part of August, its subscribers will have their fill of multiple-reel subjects. According to present arrangements, there will be eight stated two-reel subjects, all of the companies with the exception of Biograph and Melies having set a day for such a release. The days are: Monday, Selig; Tuesday, Kleine; Wednesday, Kalem; Thursday, Lubin; Friday, Edison, Essanay and Pathe; Saturday, Vitagraph. It will be noted that three of these fall on Friday, which surely ought to furnish a good supply of big subjects for the Saturday and Sunday demand. With forty-two single reels now being issued each week to General Film subscribers, the added releases will make a total of 50,000 feet of film from which to make selection.

RUNS DEPARTMENT ALONE.

How would you like to be an entire scenario department all to yourself? That's what Lloyd Lonergan, producing representative and scenario head of Thanhouser studio, is this week. His assistants, Phil Lonergan and Elmer Harris, have jumped over to Los Angeles and New Majestic and the veteran Thanhouser editor has simply been too rushed with work to fix up with other assistance in their absence. He has merely stuck to his job and "filled in" for the entire department. Lonergan is the chap who has written almost every Thanhouser story that was ever produced. He is also famous as Chief Mate of C. J. Hite's yacht "The Dividend." In fact, Mr. Hite has Lonergan to thank for the yacht, as the Thanhouser head had originally purchased it merely to use in a Lonergan yachting story.

PRAISES KALAMAZOO THEATERS.

Deputy State Fire Inspector A. E. Maynard, of Michigan, has been making a tour of inspection of picture theaters in that state. While in Kalamazoo, Deputy Maynard took occasion to pay a high compliment to the picture theaters of that city. Among other things, he said:

"I find but one minor fault with any of the houses in this city. This is the lack of proper ventilation in the booths or rooms where the machines are operated. This matter can be easily remedied and will be attended to within a short time, I believe.

"The Kalamazoo managers are observing to the letter the new state law prohibiting the employing of operators under the age of 18 years. I find that the seats are fastened securely to the floor in compliance with the law. A disastrous fire is practically impossible owing to the fact that rubbish in the rear of the picture house is lacking.

"The conditions of the establishments of Kalamazoo not only compare favorably with those of other Michigan cities, but I can safely say that they are in better condition than in any other Michigan city. I find no instance where the law is being disregarded in any way whatever."

A CENSORSHIP CONFERENCE.

President Neff, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, has arranged a conference with Frank L. Dyer, of the General Film Company; W. C. Toomey, of the Mutual Film Corporation, and Carl Laemmle, of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, to discuss the censorship question. The meeting will be held in New York City on August 7.

LEAGUE EXTENDS TERRITORY.

President M. A. Neff has issued a charter to Mr. A. W. Yearsley, of the Philippine Islands, for that territory. Idaho has received its charter, which has been delivered to W. Raymond Britton.

BOOSTING THE LEAGUE IN PITTSBURGH.

Harry Rieff, secretary of the Pennsylvania State League, has increased the membership of the league by the acquisition of twenty new members, all from Pittsburgh.

FILMS STOLEN FROM BRONX THEATER

Thieves forced their way into the office of the Corona Airdrome in the Bronx, New York City, on Thursday night, and stole six reels of film, comprising a print of the Itala subject, "The Fatal Grotto," and four reels of the Universal Film Company's product.

Murray F. Bieir, of the Emby Feature Film Company, of 145 West 45th street, owner of the Greater New York rights of "The Fatal Grotto," and to whom the print belonged, is assisting the owner of the Corona Airdrome in a vigorous search for the thieves and their booty. As an accommodation to the Emby Company's customers, Harry R. Raver, director general of the Itala Film Company, has loaned them another print.

A Misleading "Feature"

Word of Warning to Exhibitors.

In some recent issues of The Moving Picture World there appeared an advertisement of an alleged four-reel feature called "The Last Days of Pompeii." A reviewer of The Moving Picture World has now seen this "feature," and it is but just to the readers of the paper to say that the title of this production is entirely misleading. The pictures consist of two reels of the old Ambrosio feature, "The Last Days of Pompeii," of large portions lifted bodily from the Itala feature, "The Fall of Troy," and of a number of medieval battle scenes, which, of course, have nothing whatever to do with the destruction of Pompeii. The fabrication is called an extravaganza, and is marketed by the New York Film Company for a Philadelphia concern calling itself "The Italian Pompeii Film Company." It represents neither ambition nor legitimate enterprise, but only scissors and an unusual amount of impudence. There is no rhyme or reason in the piecing together of the plagiarized parts. Not even all the titles are original, some of them being taken literally from the old Ambrosio production. The original titles added are often unintelligible, badly spelt and poorly photographed. There is a touch of Pickwickian humor in the claim of copyright made on the screen. The whole jumble is bad. Its effect on the industry is to be deplored. Just as the motion picture is gaining the approval of the best classes in the country by reason of big and successful reproduction of classic subjects, the coming of an abortion like this threatens the prestige gained at so much cost.

EDISON NOTES.

Leonard W. McChesney, formerly advertising manager of the General Film Company, is now associated with Thomas A. Edison, Inc., as manager of sales of the kinetoscope department, succeeding John Pelzer, resigned.

Walter Edwin is now in Maine with a strong company of Edison players, among whom are Mary Fuller, Bliss Milford, Elsie MacLeod, Augustus Phillips, Frank McGlynn, Richard Neill, John Sturgeon and Harry Beaumont. Mr. Edwin plans to do a big seacoast story, several tales of the North Woods, a "Mary" picture, and other interesting films. The party will be absent from the studio for six or eight weeks.

* * *

The Edison Studio, which, only a few years ago, was hailed as the biggest and best-equipped moving picture studio, has already been outgrown by the Edison Company. A large addition is now being made to the front of the present building, which will provide a large area of much-needed stage room.

C. L. Chester, who produced some remarkable scenic films in South America for the Edison Company about two years ago, has been re-engaged by that company to make an extensive trip through the Northwest. Mr. Chester will travel through the beautiful Great Lakes, taking some interesting views of the famous "Soo" canal at Sault Ste. Marie, on his way to Duluth, where the greatest iron ore docks in the world are located. From here, he goes to the Glacier National Park, where he will be accompanied by twelve Indians in native costume, who will lend realism to his pictures of this wild region. Mr. Chester will then swing out to the coast, filming various scenes and spots of national fame. His wonderful success in South America forecasts some very interesting pictures from Mr. Chester's latest expedition.

Edison's version of the "Pied Piper of Hamlin," shortly to be announced, is one of the biggest spectacles that has been produced. For this film, a village was actually constructed and four hundred people were used in the great scene for which the set was used. Herbert Prior, as the piper, does a perfect bit of character work.

One of the most conspicuous absentees from the Edison booth at the moving picture exposition was Robert Brower. Mr. Brower had just spent three days fishing at Barnegat and had been so badly sunburned that his lower lip was swelled as if from poisoning. The actor remarked, with a rather gingerly smile, that he had not dared to go to the exposition for fear of being arrested for blocking the aisles.

HAWKSHAW'S ERROR.

Charles H. Streimer, manager of the Eagle Feature Film Company of New York, is not releasing "Hawkshaw. the Detective" as stated in the Moving Picture World of last week, but is releasing a four reel feature entitled "On the Trail of the Spider Gang" which will appear at the Unique Theater, 14th Street, New York, July 28, 29 and 30. Exhibitors are urged to see this presentation.

NEW YORK CITY BOLTERS RATIFY.

A meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York was held at the Union Square Hotel on Tuesday, July 22, for the purpose of ratifying the action of the delegates to the Third Annual Convention of the Motion Picture League of America in bolting that convention. The meeting was called to order at 11 o'clock in the morning and continued until 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Much time was taken by the delegates to the convention in and endeavor to explain their action, and several speakers advised strongly against seceding from the National organization. During the discussion many exhibitors left the meeting, so that when a vote was finally taken but fifty-one were recorded as being present.

The vote on a resolution to sustain the bolting delegates and to withdraw from the National League was adopted by a count of forty-five in favor of such action and six against.

TO ORGANIZE A NEW LOCAL IN NEW YORK.

A committee composed of R. L. Macnab, first vice-president of the National League, and Sidney Ascher, a New York exhibitor, has called a meeting of exhibitors of Greater New York to be held at the Union Square Hotel on Monday morning, July 28, at 10:30 o'clock, for the purpose of organizing a local branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. It is claimed by the committee that 100 local exhibitors have signified a desire to join the new organization.

BLANCHE BATES NAMES NEW "101 BISON" FEATURE.

Blanche Bates, the star of "The Girl of the Golden West," has a penchant for choosing apt theatrical titles. This was demonstrated anew last week in Los Angeles, when she acceded to Director Henry McRae's request that she name his latest Bison feature, and chose the title, "The Iron Trail" for the two-reel thriller. The episode was incidental to a special performance at the Maison Opera House, given by Miss Bates and Manager Frohman, at which nearly one hundred members of the Universal West Coast Organization were guests.

AT THE FOOT OF THE SCAFFOLD. (Kineto).

Circumstantial evidence has caused many an innocent man many years of agony in prison, has sent many a man to his death. In this picture there is an exceptionally vivid and striking example of an upright young man caught by the force of circumstances in a tangled skein of false evidence, the threads of which are broken only at the point of death. It is an intensely dramatic story in two reels.

THE "JUDGE LINDSEY" PICTURE TO BE RELEASED.

The differences which arose between the Columbine Films Company and the Cheyenne Feature Film Company over the release of a four-reel feature by the former company, entitled "Saved by the Juvenile Court," in which Judge Lindsey of Denver was featured, have been satisfactorily settled, and the Columbine Company will proceed to release the picture.

The differences between the two companies arose through a misunderstanding that has since been fully explained and adjusted to the satisfaction of both parties.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

THE Chicago branch of the International Motion Picture Association held a regular meeting in Royal League Hall, Masonic Temple, from 2:30 until 5:30 p. m., Monday, July 21st. Like all former regular meetings of this body, the proceedings were held behind closed doors. Julius A. Alcock presided.

Robert R. Levy and Wm. J. Sweeney have advised me that the attendance was extra large, owing to the great interest taken in the report that was about to be read by the chairman of the delegation to New York. There were not sufficient chairs to accommodate those assembled, and the sergeant-at-arms was obliged to secure a number of extra chairs.

The report of the secession of the Illinois delegation from the M. P. E. L. of America, was given in detail by Mr. Levy, and he reported to the writer that the action of the Illinois delegates to the recent National Convention, was endorsed unanimously, without one dissenting vote.

"It was only natural," said Mr. Levy, "that those present desired to hear the report of the delegates themselves, notwithstanding that the trade papers had given the proceedings of the New York Convention in detail. The main question in the minds of some of those present was that an explanation should be given how it was that, immediately after the retirement of the seceders from the national assembly, they had in readiness a constitution and by-laws, as well as a set of resolutions to submit."

These people, evidently, had not read the article in the Moving Picture World, issue of July 26th, page 413, where this is explained.

Mr. Levy stated that as soon as the explanation was made, all doubt was immediately removed as to the advisability of endorsing the action of the Illinois delegation. "We had no trouble in convincing those present that it was not a question of the election of Wm. J. Sweeney in the national organization, because immediately upon the organization of the International Motion Picture Association, I made the opening statement before that body, that Illinois stood for harmony and the good of the exhibitor, and that Mr. Sweeney was not a candidate in the new organization for president, although many had asked me to permit the presentation of Mr. Sweeney's name for national president, which would have meant his unanimous election." Other members of the delegation to New York followed in the same strain, and the members assembled were enthusiastic in their approval, said Mr. Levy.

Before leaving for New York, the Illinois delegates were instructed, at a regular meeting, to use their utmost efforts to bring about a definite understanding as to the number of reels to be used on a program, three reels for five cents being favored. Mr. Levy reminded the members at this meeting, that the International Motion Picture Association, while in New York, passed a resolution to that effect, an announcement that was received with great applause by those present. The members of the International Motion Picture Association in Chicago have resolved to do their utmost to conserve the best interests of exhibitors, manufacturers and exchanges, Mr. Levy informed me.

The question of ventilation was also brought up at the meeting, and the committee which had been appointed at a previous meeting, was instructed to take up the entire matter and see what can be done to protect exhibitors who are threatened with expulsion from the business. Mr. Levy cited, as an instance of the injustice that will be wrought if the ordinance of 1910 is enforced at the time set in September, that some exhibitors hold leases which will expire within six months. If these men are forced to put in a new ventilating system, costing $1000, they are absolutely without protection against unprincipled lessors, who may refuse to continue the leases except at extortionate terms. The members of this committee attended the city council meeting, held Monday evening, July 21st, at which it was expected some action would be taken on the question of ventilation, but the matter was delayed by other pressing business.

On July 29th, a special meeting of the Illinois branch of the I. M. P. A. will be held in Royal League Hall, Room 412 Masonic Temple, to consider the matter of ventilation solely. There is a conflict at present between the building and health departments of this city, with the fire prevention bureau also having its say, which places the exhibitor between three fires. He is ordered by one of these authorities to make certain changes in his house, and when these changes are made, a conflicting authority steps in and pronounces them all wrong. For example: the fire prevention bureau, in certain cases, ordered the proprietors of moving picture theaters to replace the glass window leading from the booth to the outer air with an iron shutter, which must always be kept closed. The health department official came along, and he ordered that the window must be kept wide open.

New Grand Central, St. Louis, Shows "Les Miserables."

William Sievers, manager of the New Grand Central, St. Louis, writes that "Les Miserables," the big eight reel production, was run in that house for the week beginning July 6, with great success. Following are several quotations from a three-quarter column criticism, by Ripley D. Saunders, in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch:

"In striking and graceful contrast to the ordinary 'motion picture show' of crude photoplay melodrama and cheap vaudeville is the presentation of Victor Hugo's 'Les Miserables' at the New Grand Central theater this week.

"The production is made without the slightest concession to the popular managerial belief that lurid stage stories and horseplay comedy alone appeal to the American public.

"Significantly, also, the performance last night was witnessed by as distinguished an audience as one sees at the high-priced premiers of any play during the regular winter season, and this audience filled the house to the doors.

"These players are masters of the great art of dramatic pantomime, which is the rock-foundation of all true dramatic work, and they tell Victor Hugo's tremendous story in action so vivid, and with such fidelity in emotional gesture and facial expression, that it becomes grippingly vital without words.

"Practically the complete story of Victor Hugo's vast human epic is told in this daring picture-play version, and the astonishing truth is that the very book itself seems to live in flesh and blood before one's eyes.

"Last night's audience was held spell-bound by the combined dramatic and pictorial value of the entertainment. It is because of this demonstrated value, and because of the contrast of such a performance to the average offering in its field, that the Post-Dispatch calls attention to it in this unusual manner.

"'Les Miserables,' as now being presented in St. Louis, is genuine art. It is Victor Hugo's titanic dreaming made manifest in the flesh."

Scott Pictures Now Running at Princess Theater.

The motion pictures taken by Herbert Ponting, the official photographer of the ill-fated Scott expedition to the south pole, are now being shown in the afternoon and evening at the Princess Theater, this city.

The leading dailies have devoted much space to the presentations. Richard Henry Little, in the Examiner, says:

"The pictures are without doubt the most interesting and the most remarkable motion pictures ever exhibited in Chicago. They are living records of one of the most daring and brilliant adventures of modern times, and give one an appreciation and understanding of what Captain Scott and his heroic men endured that can be gained in no other way."

A review of these remarkable pictures will appear in a later issue of this paper.

Chicago City Hall Has Special Room For Showing Films.

M. L. C. Funkhouser, second deputy superintendent of police, has issued the following circular letter, dated July 21, touching on the showing of moving pictures in the City Hall for censorship.

"A space in the City Hall is being prepared where moving picture films can be shown.

"The city will furnish a licensed operator free of charge to all exchanges to run the films. However, if an exchange desires to use its own operator to show its pictures, that privilege will be granted.

"The only expense the exchanges will be put to will be the cost of the usual permit. Kindly advise this office whether it is your desire to use your own operator or the one furnished by the city."

Next City Hall Examination of M. P. Operators.

At a meeting of the board of examiners of moving picture operators, held at the office of the city electrician, Monday, July 14th, it was ruled that the next examination for moving picture operators, following that of Friday, July 18th, will be held Friday, August 8th. All applicants desiring to take the examination, August 8th, will apply for application blanks to the city examiner on Tuesday, August 5th, at 1:00 p. m.

The Board will not pass on the qualification of any applicants for apprentice permits, after July 19th, until Monday, August 4th.

Chicago Film Brevities.

George Madison, assistant manager of the Pastime Theater, 66 W. Madison St., was a visitor at the Chicago office last week, and subscribed for the World. The Pastime seats 450 people and charges five cents for a program of licensed pictures. Two singers are now being used, and the number will be increased to four next week. It seems as if this is offering far too much for the money asked. Harry Fitzpatrick is manager. The owner of the Pastime will open a new theater at 40 S. Clark St., some time in August. It is announced that this theater will be one of the finest in the city, being fireproof throughout, and provided with an up-to-date ventilating system.

Helen Gardner in "Cleopatra" has been showing to big business of late, according to reports received. Great success attended the presentations at the Shubert Theater, Kansas City, Mo., and the Lyceum Theater, St. Joseph, Mo. It is stated that this feature showed to $1400 in four days at the King's Theater and Shenandoah Theater, St. Louis, at an admission of 25 cents.

The Aurora home-coming celebration, taken with an American Junior camera by McCory and Kramer, 229 Chicago St., Elgin, Ill., was shown recently to capacity business at the Fox Theater, Aurora, Ill. The Fox seats 1800 people, and the film has been booked for a return engagement, July 25 and 26.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Scott's new open-air Hippodrome, Jacksonville, Ill., was opened recently with Ambrosio's "Satan," with Luman C. Mann, lecturer. The pictures were shown to over 1500 people the first night. The night following, it rained continuously, excepting an interval between 7:30 and 8:00. Thinking it was about to clear up, the seats were uncovered and the box office opened. The sale was about 124, when the rain began to pour down again. The second reel had been reached by that time, and those present were instructed to get their money back at the box office. Fifty-four of the 124 remained to see the show out, under umbrellas. This was the last chance to see "Satan," and the 54 satisfied themselves fully.

HAPPENINGS WITH ESSANAY.

The Essanay releases for July, both comedies and dramas, from the Chicago studios offer many new faces on the screen, and will prove very welcome to the exhibitor and the hungry-loving photoplay public. The Essanay Film Manufacturing Company have almost entirely reorganized their Chicago stock companies, adding many well known performers from the legitimate stage, each of whom holds an authoritative record for artistic and meritorious work under the best well known theatrical managers in America.

No expense has or will be spared in the making of Essanay photoplays either in Chicago or any other location that the company may operate, and the changes made add a freshness to Essanay releases that will shortly be the talk of the country.

Francis X. Bushman, supported by an excellent company under the direction of two most capable producers, is located at a new studio at Ithaca, N. Y. This country affords some of the most magnificent backgrounds to be had in America, and backgrounds will play an important part in these Eastern productions.

The new studio and laboratories at Niles, Calif., are completed at a cost of $50,000 and Mr. Anderson promises some unusual subjects in both single and double reels. All these changes have been made after months of careful preparation.

The two special multiple reel releases for July were "The Forbidden Way," released July 7, and "Tapped Wires," released July 21.

CANNOCK GOES ABROAD.

Mr. F. B. Cannock, of the Precision Machine Co., left Thursday, July 17, on the Adriatic for an extended trip to Europe, combining pleasure with business.

No doubt he will have a very pleasant and profitable trip, as the Simplex is as popular in Europe as it is in this country, having successfully competed with all the European projectors.

VARIETY MARKS THIS WEEK'S RELIANCE PROGRAM.

"Below the Dead Line" is the interesting title of Monday's Reliance release. It is essentially a melodrama and deals with the more refined and therefore the more dangerous style of crooks who play for big game and operate among the upper strata of society.

Norma Phillips as a beautiful young girl who is forced to aid the crooks against her will does some excellent acting and Thomas Mills handles the role of an absinthe fiend with exceptional skill.

In "Rosita's Cross of Gold," the release of Wednesday, Rosemary Theby is again seen in the part of a young Italian girl. All of the action of this drama is laid in New York's little Italy, giving splendid chance for interesting character drawings which have been made the most of by a particularly strong cast under Edgar Lewis' able direction.

The release of Saturday, August 2, is a child story that has a splendid appeal because of the fact that the plot is dependent upon the comradeship of a cute little boy and his lovable old grandfather. The old man has reached the age where he is again a child, and the old playmates decide to become pirates for one day at least. Their game just misses ending in a tragedy which makes "The Little Pirate" a story of more than passing interest.

RELIANCE STUDIO HAPPENINGS.

Work on the open air stage of the new studio is progressing so rapidly that at least one company will be producing pictures there by August 1. Eddie Schulter is dividing his time between the uptown and downtown plants, while Rosemary Theby, Edgena De Lespine and a number of other members of the regular stock company are preparing to live in the beautiful neighborhood of Riverdale-on-the-Hudson, where they will be near the scene of their labors.

George Siegmann had a peculiar accident during the making of "The Smuggler's Sister," recently. Edgar Lewis was having considerable difficulty getting a flash of a dog chasing a cat into a barn. George volunteered to hold the cat which turned on him as soon as he let go of it and did considerable damage before he could shake it off.

The well-known author James Oppenheim has written a scenario which will be released as a two-reel feature on August 9, under the title of "The Fight for Right." Rosemary Theby and Irving Cummings will be starred jointly in this drama, which deals with the labor union's side of the prison labor controversy and prison reform. Oscar C. Apfel is responsible for the staging of this timely story.

Among the newly acquired Reliance players are Norma Phillips and Irene Hunt. Miss Phillips is seen to advantage in "Below the Dead Line," while Miss Hunt appears in the leading role of "Kentucky Foes."

THE COMMERCIAL MOTION PICTURES CO., INC., BRANCHES OUT.

Owing to the demand for industrial, hygienic, educational and scenic subjects in motion pictures, the Commercial Company has started an extensive campaign that will embrace all of the above subjects. In six months, this company has made wonderful progress, and has earned a reputation for service and quality.

In order to successfully carry out this campaign, more capital is required. The Commercial Company has therefore increased its capitalization to $100,000, a limited amount of which is now open for subscription. A meeting of the present and future stockholders will be held at the offices of the company on Monday evening, July 21st, at 8 P. M., 102 West 101st Street.

We cordially invite all interested parties to attend this meeting, inspect our laboratory, and hear our projected plans. A prospectus will be mailed to those unable to attend on request. The Commercial Motion Pictures Co., Inc.

Edward M. Roskam, President.

NEW DEVICES FOR NEW THEATERS.

The Automatic Ticket Selling and Cash Register is being specified by most of the new theaters which will be completed this Fall. Complete data for installation of machines is furnished to the architects by the Automatic Ticket Selling and Cash Register Company so that a perfect installation of the machine may be had.

Judging from sales' reports of the company, the moving picture owners and managers certainly appreciate the value of using this machine.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs

By George Blaisdell.

AT the Famous Players Studio, on Monday afternoon, Little Mary was rehearsing the initial scenes in "In the Bishop's Carriage," an adaptation in three reels of Miriam Michelson's novel and stage play. The photodrama will follow the novel. Director Dawley was guiding the rehearsal. In the cast supporting Miss Pickford among others are John Steppling, Howard Missimer, Dave Wall and "Boots" Wall. Miss Pickford will play Nancy, the girl crook. It is said to be the first time she has taken a part of this sort. The Players have just finished "Caprice," in three reels, with Miss Pickford in the lead, supported by Ernest Truex and Owen Moore.

"Tess of the D'Urbervilles," the lead in which was played by Minnie Maddern Fiske, and which was finished several weeks ago, will be issued in five reels. It is the intention of the management of the company to make no undue attempt to restrict to three or four reels the productions in which appear the stars of larger magnitude. If it be necessary to make five reels in order to put over the picture in the best form five will be made. This is well. When a really big play runs to four reels one more will not make much difference from the exhibitor's viewpoint. A five-reel play may be shown twice in an evening comfortably; this allows, say, an hour and a half to a run, or an average of eighteen minutes to a reel.

An expedition that it is expected will be rich in results from a kinematographic standpoint sailed from New York on July 19. It is under the leadership of Captain Campbell Besley, of London. In the party are F. Eugene Farnsworth, artist-traveler-lecturer, formerly of Boston and more recently of New York, where he has been connected with the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, and lastly with the Standard Film Company; Franklin B. Coates, of New Haven; A. Galaid, of Boston; John Dunn, a New York taxidermist, and J. K. Holbrook, of New York, an experienced cameraman. The expedition will be gone many months, and will travel many thousands of miles. It is intended to explore the wilder parts of Brazil, argentina, Bolivia, Peru and the Guianas. Much attention will be given to securing motion pictures of human and animal life in the remoter regions.

Darwin Karr, who for more than two years has been the leading man of the Solax company, and who before that was for six months with the Edison company, will retire from the Fort Lee aggregation on September 1. It is probable that Mr. Karr will fill a few weeks' vaudeville engagements following the date mentioned before settling down again to picture work. Nothing has been settled as to where his new home will be. Mr. Karr is in fine physical condition, and ascribes it partly to the fact that in all the months he has been with the Solax he has driven his machine from his home in Bath Beach, down Coney Island way, to the studio, formerly at Flushing and later at Fort Lee.

Bert Angeles, former Vitagraph director, is now working with the Universal. His pictures will be released under the Gem brand. Mr. Angeles will at the beginning turn out three comedies each month and possibly a two-reel drama. Among the Vitagraph pictures which Mr. Angeles has made recently are "He Answered the Ad," "A Maid and Three Men," "Cutey Tries Reporting," "The Coming of Gretchen, "Roughing the Cub," and all of the "Belinda" series.

There was a little gathering of former Bostonians at the Screen Club on Saturday afternoon. Naturally the topic automatically drifted to beans. In the party were "Doc" Willat, Frank Cheyenne Carroll, "Bob" Daly and "Bill" Blaisdell. "Doc" Willat confessed, in fact "announced with pride," that he ate beans every morning for breakfast just as he would eat pie for dessert for dinner. He said that Mrs. Willat purchased this Yankee staple two dozen cans at a time. The bean topic quite naturally and also automatically faded just after this. It was the silent tribute to a real hero and a great patriot.

Earl J. Hudson, general manager of the Standard Film Company, is spending a two weeks' vacation in his home town of Elgin, Ill.

Gertrude McCoy, of the Edison company, is enjoying in Virginia her first vacation for a long time. Miss McCoy declares she intends to forget that there is such a thing as a moving picture—that she will not even write a script.

James Kirkwood, who for some time has been directing and playing the lead in Victor films, is going back to the Biograph company, in which he has played before. This time, however, Mr. Kirkwood will direct. He has had a wide experience in screen work, having also played with the Vitagraph, the Imp, and Reliance. In his work with the Victor company he has maintained a good standard of production, in spite of the fact that he has essayed the double role of player and director.

Gertrude Robinson is also leaving the Victor for the Biograph. This is a return engagement for her as well as for Mr. Kirkwood, her director. Miss Robinson was for a long time with Reliance.

William Robert Daly, who has been making Imp comedies for many months, is to succeed Mr. Kirkwood as director of Victor pictures. Mr. Daly's leads will be played by Glenn White and Fritzi Brunette.

* * *

A matter of news that will be widely welcomed by all picture lovers is of the return to the screen, after a long absence, of Florence Lawrence. Miss Lawrence is one of the earliest of the film favorites. Her first work was with the Edison company. Afterward she played with the Vitagraph, Biograph, Lubin and Victor companies. While with the Lubin company she played opposite Arthur Johnson, and the work of these two players attracted wide attention. Miss Lawrence will be allied with the Universal company, her pictures, which will be multiple reel and of a character somewhat different from the ordinary, being released under the Victor brand. At this writing it has not been determined who will play opposite her. All of her pictures will be under the direction of Harry Salter.

David Horsley, who with Mrs. Horsley and their young son sailed recently for the other side, in a five-minute lull in the round of festivities writes from London to say that he is having a glorious time.

* * *

Elmer Booth, whose work as the Snapper Kid in Biograph's "Musketeers of Pig Alley" caused so much favorable comment, has joined the cast of the Famous Players. He will begin work in the picture following "In the Bishop's Carriage."

Joe Graybill, old-time Biograph player, and said to be the author of "The Musketeers of Pig Alley," is now stationed at the Pathe studio. Mr. Graybill, who will be recalled to mind by many as the "actor who wore a mustache"—he has it yet—has done much strong work; we may look forward to much more.

Major M. C. L. Funkhouser, second deputy superintendent of police of Chicago and general guardian of that city's morals, is another police official who has barred Kinemacolor's "Scarlet Letter." The major is said to have wrestled long and seriously with the question before he decided to bar the picture. He based his action on regard for the children and not on account of adults.

North Yakima, which is not in Japan but in the State of Washington, is to have a local board of censorship. The censors will include a minister, the city superintendent of schools, the manager of one of the picture houses, the general secretary of the Young Women's Christian Association and a member of the Woman's Club. Here seems to be an ideal board of censors—from the viewpoint of those who make the loudest demands for the local staff. If anything gets by it that contains interest for the average adult male, that more or less persecuted individual should congratulate himself.

SELIG WILL PRODUCE "THE SPOILERS."

Selig has secured the picture play rights for Rex Beach's famous book "The Spoilers." William and Marshall Farnum, well known legitimate actors, will appear in the leading roles.

BACK TO THE PRIMITIVE.

Thomas Persons, formerly superintendent of the Selig Polyscope Plant in Chicago, has been made superintendent of the Selig Wild Animal Farm at Edendale, Calif., and will remove his lares et penates to the glorious climate, where he may be lulled to rest by the mellifluous roars of the lions or the diabolic laughter of the hyenas, in preference to the carping chatter of the actors, the kicks of the clicking camera men, or the acidified remarks of the developing department.

"The Adventures of Jacques."

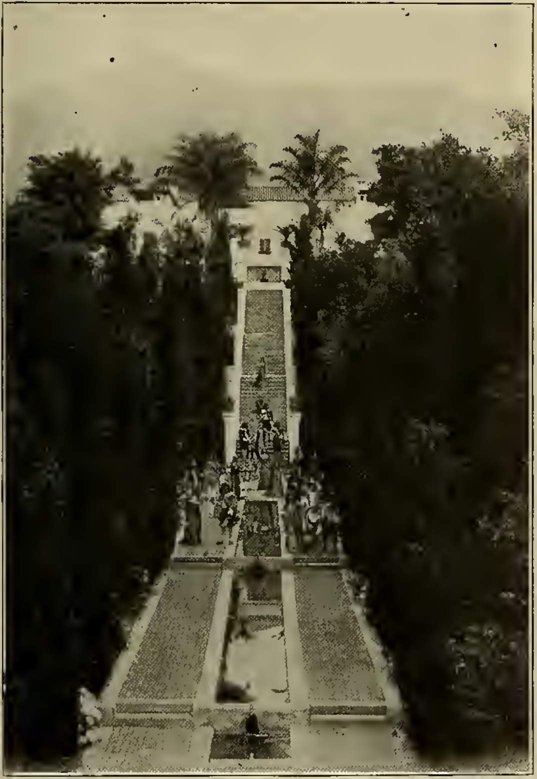
A French Romance Produced by Lorimer Johnston for the American.

NOT unlike the hero of Dumas' "The Three Guardsmen" D'Artagnan, we are treated to a view of J. Warren Kerrigan as Jacques Le Grande in the costume of a cavalier, not as grotesque, of course, but the same general makeup, the same spirit of daring and thirst for adventure, on a mission that was to bring him fortune and fame.

Jacques, a young nobleman, hails from Gascony. The family fortune has long since been depleted and Jacques is sent forth with only his "trusty steed" and his father's blessing with the admonition "Be ready always to lay down your life for the King."

Before he has journeyed far he encounters adventure. Approaching an inn he meets a number of cavaliers to whom the young man's sober mien and gallant bearing appear rather ludicrous. Upon his stern demand as to whether they might be laughing at him or his horse, they sarcastically inform him that it is his horse, of course, that has provoked them to laughter. Unabashed, he asserts his horse to be his friend and an apology must be made for the insult offered. This to these haughty dignitaries is more amusing than ever. A duel is fought and Jacques conquers his adversaries, so the apology is forthcoming.

At the palace another drama is being enacted, but little did Jacques know what an important part he would be called to play at the imperial court.



Scene from "The Adventures of Jacques" (American).

The Queen leaves the palace for a walk, accompanied by a retinue of nobles, courtiers, and others, with Constance, a lady in waiting, bringing up the rear. Now the King had a failing for Constance, and though his attentions were not reciprocated, she dared not resist him. The charms of the fair Constance so smite the King that he has her brought before him, when he rapturously embraces and kisses her. This act of indiscretion is observed by the Queen, whose jealousy is kindled to a furious blaze, and the unfortunate Constance is ordered confined in a watch tower.

The execution of this order is left to the Duke de Monserrat and a nobleman, and we leave them as they ride with the imprisoned Constance to their destination.

Jacques in the meantime has not been inactive. After the encounter at the entrance to the "Au Lion D' Or" Inn he retires to the room assigned to him by the host and from the window overhead hears his vanquished foes plotting against him. Drawing the curtains of his bed aside he places a long bench in the bed and covers it up with the bedclothes, giving the appearance of his having retired. Again drawing the curtains around the bed he extinguishes the light and secretes himself to await further developments. His vigil is soon rewarded by the stealthy approach of his now bitter foes, who traw the curtains of the bed and, taking as careful aim as the dim illumination from the moonlight will permit, fire a pistol at what they presume to be the figure of their conqueror. Quick as a flash Jacques appears from his hiding place and with a few well directed thrusts of his rapier pierces the nonplused antagonists.

Scene from "The Adventures of Jacques" (American).

His further stay at the Inn is without other serious incidents, and after breakfasting the next morning he is off on his way.

Riding along, one evening, he meets the duke and nobleman with Constance, whom he follows at a distance. At the watch tower he insists upon rescuing the imprisoned maiden, meets opposition, fights a duel and is successful in entering the structure, but is now repaid by himself being imprisoned with Constance. A thrilling escape is accomplished by means of a rope from the top of the tower. The duke, not to be outwitted, secures the assistance of his robber-band, and both Jacques and Constance are again captured and taken to the rendezvous of the robbers to await the pleasure of the duke. The two prisoners manage to free themselves and make good their escape.

Constance is now taken to a convent, where the mother superior promises to guard over her welfare.

In the meantime, the King, learning of the absence of Constance, upbraids the Queen and has her confined in the dungeons. His failure to secure possession of the object of his adoration so infuriates him that he heaps maledictions upon the church. His conduct causes indignation among the noblemen and a plot is formed to assassinate him.

The news is carried to the Queen in the dungeons, where the Duke, through bribery, has been allowed to meet her. Jacques, learning of the plot, apprises the King and promptly offers to aid him. As a ruse the two exchange costumes and prepare for flight, which against the overwhelming numbers, is the only sane course. They finally take refuge at the convent where his majesty's offense is condoned and the King and Queen reconciled. For his bravery, Jacques is knighted by the King and left free to win the fair Constance.

Director Johnston deserves much credit for his able work, as do Mr. Kerrigan, for his splendid interpretation of Jacques, and Miss Rich as Constance. The dramatization is perfect and the costuming and selection of settings, which required no little study and care, are exquisite. No expense seems to have been spared in the production of this masterpiece.

This new departure on the part of the American will be heralded by exhibitors, as this class of subject enables them to advertise a drawing card in a new and novel role and also affords the actors a much better opportunity to utilize their splendid histrionic abilities.

DEFENSE OF THREE REEL PICTURES.

By A. Warner, President Warner's Feature Film Co.

On July 18th. the daily motion picture department of the Washington Herald contained the following dictum relating to feature films: "A great influx of cheap, flashy features is sure to be one of the developments of the motion picture entertainment this fall, when the price for features, as we now know them, will slump with the production of great feature masterpieces which are to be an incident of the 1913-1914 theatrical season."

This is a remarkably broad statement, and one that the trend of events scarcely justifies. When the first feature films appeared upon the market they did not meet with a very favorable reception, for the reason that exhibitors had not been educated up to that appreciation of feature productions which they now hold. Consequently, prices obtained for them were nothing extraordinary. Practically every feature offered to exhibitors a year and a half ago, was from the European market, and this condition existed until Warner's Feature Film Co. began to supply the growing demand with American-made films in three reels. The excellent reputation of Warner's Features can be traced directly to the high standard which they have attained through the lavish expenditure of money and the infinite care with which the scenarios have been selected.

There is certainly no good reason why producers of Warner's Features, or of any other brand for that matter, should begin to cheapen their output simply because a number of theatrical stars have been engaged to portray their famous stage characters upon the screen. On the contrary, it would seem more reasonable to suppose that from this time on, the three-reel features will be more elaborately staged than ever, owing to increased competition. And furthermore, it takes genuine ability to portray emotions and roles upon the screen. Some miserable failures in film productions have been recorded in the past by theatrical producers who believed that all that was necessary to make pictures was to have a star.

It remains to be seen whether the film productions of the 1913-1914 theatrical season will be classed as masterpieces. Whatever the editor of the Washington Herald's Motion Picture Department had in mind, his opinion certainly cannot be extended so as to include such producers as Warner's Feature Film Co., and the others who have earned the right to speak of their three-reel pictures as features.

WARNER'S FEATURE NOTES.

H. M. Warner has just returned from a business trip to Pittsburgh. He reports closing with the Feature Film & Calcium Light Co., whereby H. M. and A. Warner have bought back the half interest of that company and will conduct the office as the twenty-first center of distribution for Warner's Features.

Starting Monday, July 28th, "Theodora" will be shown in the Palace Theater, Market St., Philadelphia, for a solid week. On July 17th, the Paris Theater of Denver—seating capacity 2200—showed "Theodora" to a crowd that lined the sidewalk for over half a block. The management of the Paris has decided to play it indefinitely.

Advices from Sam Warner, in charge of the London office of Warner's Features, indicate that exhibitors in England and on the Continent are taking kindly to Warner's Features. Sam is located at 18 Cecil Court, London, W. C., in the heart of the film district.

NEW BRANCH OF JOHNS-MANVILLE.

In accordance with its long established policy of business expansion, this concern has recently opened a branch office at Charlotte, N. C. The new office, which is located in the Commercial Bank Building, is in charge of Mr. E. U. Heslop, who is assisted in covering the western section of North Carolina by Mr. P. J. McCusker and Mr. Paul W. Whitlock.

Foreign Trade Notes

BRITISH NOTES.

With the moving picture industry of such dimensions as it has already attained in Great Britain it has been a matter of wonderment by many recent visitors from the New World that there existed no charitable institution with the sole object of dispensing financial or other aid to recessitous people in the trade. That shortcoming, however, now looks like being remedied for this week the leading members of the trade on this side have received a letter from Mr. Saml. Harris appealing for their support and co-operation in an endeavor to found such an institution. The proposal, if it materializes, will take the name of "The Cinematograph Benevolent Institution." It has already been promised the support of the respective chairmen of the manufacturers, renters and exhibitors associations.

Last week the work of the Edison contingent touring England was confined to the Midlands, Berkshire being the chief locate. Mr. C. J. Brabin, producer, led the party from the West of England on Friday and the next day he soon got to work on a rustic picture which will, I think, take the name of "The Village Wedding," after Sir Luke Filde's famous painting, seeing that the place in which both were made are identical. Other rustic subjects are also being produced in the pretty Berkshire lanes which were never so attractive as now. Next week, I am informed, the Edison photoplayers will be transferred into the mountain scenery of North Wales and later still journey further north into the Lake District and Yorkshire.

Mr. Charles Prince, the popular French comedian is at present playing in a revue at a London theater. He will be familiar to most American exhibitors as "Wiffles."

Mr. Charles Urban, the inventor of Kinemacolor, has had his enterprise in exhibiting to the Pope at the Vatican a number of Kinemacolor films, amply rewarded. His Holiness has decided to adopt Mr. Urban's invention as the medium to be used at the Vatican for the portrayal of life outside. The films shown included the "Pilgrimage to Lourdes," "Blessing the Sea at Malta," and the "Pope's Benediction to the people." These, says Mr. Urban, will be released shortly but in both countries will probably be exhibited only under church auspices.

At the moment of writing King George is touring Lancashire and Yorkshire, which countries are next to London in kinematographic population in this country. A primalist selected to accompany the Royal entourage informs me that at Knowsley Hall last night (July 10th), the king made his first acquaintance with singing and talking pictures through the Edison Kinetophone. A minstrel performance was the chief feature and the king more than once expressed his admiration of the perfect simultaneousty between the pictures and music. The royal presentation of the Kinetophone is a distinct triumph for the Edison Co.

It is interesting to compare the various shipments of films to this country from the United States. In its export of moving picture films and accessories it appears, from recent Board of Trade reports, that Boston is a formidable rival to New York. Last years despatches from this port exceeded 11,000 miles over three-quarters of which were for Great Britain. As there are practically little or no producing concerns in Boston, that is of any pretensions, the only feasible explanation seems to be that the port is used by the manufacturers of the middle and western states.

Under the direction of Mr. C. A. Lupeoti a party of moving picture enthusiasts are undertaking a visit to Alaska, Canada and British Columbia for the purpose of taking scenic, industrial, dramatic and natural history pictures illustrative of life and conditions in the lesser known outposts of those countries. It is one of the objects of the party to secure a type of dramatic picture that they consider has not been exploited by existing American firms—that is life amongst the fur and skin traders along the northern boundaries.

Notice has been given during the past few days that the Altar Feature Film Co., and Ruffell's Imperial Bioscope Syndicate, both firms who have had from time to time American dealings, will shortly be amalgamated.

Other British Notes.

Here are a few items from an occasonal London correspondent that will interest the American picture lovers. Can any of the "fans" imagine King Baggot in a tin suit instead of dress clothes, as Ivanhoe?

The only important development which I think might interest American readers is the progress of the Edison Co., in this country.

They have a fairly large company working in Devonshire and Cornwall and to my idea they have chosen the best part of this country for picture work. So far they have been fortunate as regards weather. The titles of the subjects they are making have not yet been announced but I am under the impression from what I have heard that they are turning out something creditable.

We have been having rather severe warm weather here which has hurt business with the exhibitor and many of the theaters are working at a loss. We are likely to have two or three weeks more of this then the business will get back to normal.

I under stand that George Kleine has purchased "The Last Days of Pompeii" from the Ambrosio Co., and I also understand that he is in negotiation with the Gloria Co., who are producing the same subject with a view of getting them to suppress their production for a consideration. I understand that Mr. Kleine paid a large sum of money for this production and he has it for the whole world.

Trusting this will find you enjoying yourself.

Yours sincerely,
Bliechol.

GRAND THEATER, BARTLESVILLE, OKLA.

Here is a moving picture theater that has an inviting appearance, for it has a very nice clear white entrance, one that is not vitiated by unsightly posters. The house was opened by A. M. Crooke, the manager, on June 5, and played to 2,500 paid admissions on the first night's business. The structure cost $10,000 while the furnishings cost in the neighborhood of $5,000.

New York Picture Theater Ordinance

Full Text of the New Regulations Passed by the Board of Aldermen and Signed by Mayor Gaynor.

While the ordinance recently passed by the New York Board of Aldermen and signed by Mayor Gaynor to regulate picture theaters in New York City applies in the main to local conditions, there are many points in its provisions that will interest motion picture theater men in all parts of the world. The Moving Picture World gives the full text herewith as a matter of record and general information.

An Ordinance Relative to Motion Picture Theaters.

Be it ordained by the Board of Aldermen of The City of New York, as follows: Chapter 7, Title 2, Article 3, Section 352—Motion Pictures and Motion Picture Theaters.

352A.

Motion pictures shall be deemed a display on a screen or other device whereby pictures are displayed of characters or objects in motion, whether or not accompanied by music, lecture, recitation or song.

352B.

A motion picture theater shall be deemed any public hall or room in The City of New York in which motion pictures are exhibited, in which the seating capacity does not exceed 600, and in which there is no stage or scenery.

An open air motion picture theater shall be deemed any public place or space in the open air in The City of New York in which motion pictures are exhibited, and in which there is no stage or scenery.

The Mayor shall appoint such inspectors as shall be necessary to carry out the provisions of this ordinance. They shall be known as "Motion Picture Theater Inspectors" and shall be paid such compensation as shall be fixed by the Board of Aldermen on recommendations of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment.

The Bureau of Licenses shall issue all motion picture licenses granted by the Mayor, and, by the authority of the Mayor, shall regulate and control all motion picture theaters provided.

1. Applicants for motion picture theater licenses shall file plans and specifications of the motion picture theater with the Bureau of Buildings of the borough in which the motion picture theater is to be situated, and must file a copy of such plans and specifications, duly approved by the Superintendent of Buildings, with the application for the license, which application shall be made to the Bureau of Licenses on blanks furnished by it for that purpose.

2. The Bureau of Licenses shall, without delay, upon the request of an applicant, pass upon the location of the motion picture theater and upon the character of the applicant requesting the license.

3. The Bureau of Licenses shall request the Fire Department, Bureau of Buildings, Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, and Department of Health, to inspect said theaters, and the said departments shall file, in the Bureau of Licenses, within ten days, detailed written reports, which shall include a statement of any violations of law, ordinances, rules and regulations, and any dangerous conditions. Upon the failure of any of said departments (excepting the Fire Department) to file detailed written reports in reply to the request of the Bureau of Licenses, the said bureau may disregard said department and in its discretion may issue a license.

4. Until the provisions of this ordinance shall have been complied with, no license shall be issued.

1. Plans—Before the erection, construction or alteration of a building, or part thereof, to be used as a motion picture theater, there must be filed with the Superintendent of Buildings, complete plans and detailed statement as set forth in section 4 of the Building Code. The plans must show clearly and fully the location and width of all exits, passageways, stairs, fire escapes, aisles, etc.; arrangement of seats, size of floor beams, walls, supports, etc.; the location and construction of the inclosure for the motion picture light and machinery, and for other similar apparatus; a diagram of the lot or plot, showing outlets from all exits, and also such other statements, plans or details as may be required by the Superintendent of Buildings.

2. Prohibition—Motion picture theaters shall not be constructed in frame buildings within the fire limits, nor in hotels, tenement houses or lodging houses, nor in factories or workshops, except where the theater is separated from the rest of the building by unpierced fireproof walls and floors, and in no case shall they be constructed or operated above or below the ground floor of any building.

3. Exits and Courts—All such buildings must be provided on the main floor of the theater with at least two separate exits, one of which shall be in the front and the other in the rear, both leading to unobstructed outlets on the street. Where the main floor of the theater accommodates more than 300 people there shall be at least three such exits, the aggregate width in feet of such exits shall not be less than one-twentieth of the number of persons to be accommodated thereby. No exits shall be less than 5 feet in width, and there shall be a main exit not less than 10 feet in total width.

In all such buildings to be erected or to be altered so as to be used for a motion picture theater, if unobstructed exit to a street cannot be provided at the rear of such buildings, as herein specified, either an open court or a fireproof passage or corridor must be provided from rear exit to the street front of at least the following width: 4 feet in the clear for theaters accommodating 100 persons or less; for every additional 100 persons the width to be increased 8 inches. Such passage must be constructed of fireproof material and must be at least 10 feet high in the clear. The walls forming such passage must be at least 8 inches thick, of brick or other approved fireproof material, and if there be a basement the wall on the auditorium side should either run 1 foot below the cellar bottom or may be carried in the cellar on iron columns and girders properly fireproofed according to sections 106 and 107 of the Building Code.

The ceiling of said passage, and if there be a basement, the flooring must be constructed according to section 106 of the Building Code.

If unobstructed rear exit or exits to a street are provided, the said exit or exits must be of the same total width required for the court or passage above mentioned.

Said passages and exits to the street, as above, must be used for no other purposes except for exit and entrance and must be kept free and clear.

The level of the open court or passage at the front of building shall not be greater than one step above the level of the sidewalk, and the grade shall not be more than 1 foot in 10, with no perpendicular rises.

All exit doors must be unlocked when building is open to the public. They must be fireproof and made to open outwardly and so arranged as not to obstruct the required width of exit or court when opened. All doors leading to fire escapes must be not less than 40 inches wide in the clear, and shall be located at the opposite side or end of the gallery from other exit doors.

4. Galleries and Stairs—A gallery may be permitted, except in a theater erected on a lot less than twenty feet in width, but it shall not include more than 25 per cent. of the total seating capacity of the theater. Entrance to and exit from said gallery shall in no case lead to the main floor of the theater, and the gallery shall be provided with a stair or stairs equipped with handrails on both sides. Stairs over 7 feet wide shall be provided with center handrail. The risers of the stairs shall not exceed 7¾ inches, and the treads, excluding nosings, shall not be less than 9½ inches. There shall be no circular or winding staircases.

The total width of the stairs shall not be less than 8 feet in the clear where the gallery accommodates 150 people; for every 50 people less than 150 which the gallery accommodates, said width may be reduced 1 foot.

Stairs shall be constructed of fireproof material, and such material and the bearing capacity of such stairs shall be approved by the Bureau of Buildings.

Galleries must also be provided with at least one line of fire escapes leading to an open court, fireproof passage or street without re-entering the same or any other building.

If the fire escape leads to a point in the court nearer the street than any exit, there must be a width of not less than 4 feet in the clear between the outer edge of the fire escape and the outer wall of the court.

5. Fire Escapes—All fire escapes must have balconies not less than 3 feet 4 inches in width in the clear and not less than 4 feet 6 inches long, and from said balconies there shall be staircases extending to the ground level with a rise of not over 7¾ inches and a step of not less than 9½ inches, and the width of the stairs must not be less than 3 feet 4 inches.

6. Auditorium and Other Rooms—If the walls of the auditorium contain wood studs they shall be covered with either expanded metal lath or wire mesh and plastered with three coats of first class plaster, or may be covered with metal on one-half inch plaster boards. The joints shall be properly filled with mortar.

The ceilings of all such rooms shall be plastered with three coats of first class plaster on wire mesh or metal lath, or covered with one-half inch plaster boards, and plastered or covered with metal.

If there be a basement or cellar, the ceiling under the auditorium floor must be plastered with three coats of first class plaster on wire mesh or expanded metal lath or may be covered with metal on one-half inch plaster boards.

The basement or cellar under the auditorium shall be kept free and clear, except the space used for the heating apparatus, for machinery connected with the theater and for coal.

7. Construction of Booths—Apparatus for projecting motion pictures shall be enclosed in a booth or enclosure constructed so as to be fireproof, in accordance with the specifications of chapter 756 of the Laws of 1911. The booth shall be equipped with a vent flue as prescribed in section 352C, paragraph 2, of this ordinance. Booths shall contain an approved fireproof box for the storage of films not on the projecting machine. Films shall not be stored in any other place on the premises; they shall be rewound and repaired either in the booth or in some other approved fireproof enclosure.

Where miniature motion picture machines are employed in connection with private exhibitions the requirements of the above paragraph may be so modified as to permit, instead of the regulation booth, an approved fireproof box, unventilated, and of a size only sufficient to properly enclose the machine.

8. Gradients—To overcome any difference of level in and between corridors, lobbies and aisles, gradients of not over 1 foot in 10 feet, or steps having a rise not over 8 inches, and a width of not less than 10 inches, must be used.

9. Aisles—All aisles in the auditorium and gallery must not be less than 3 feet wide in the clear. No aisle, passageway, or space in the rear of the auditorium shall be obstructed by any camp stool, chair, sofa or settee, nor shall any person be permitted to stand or sit therein.

10. Chairs—All chairs in the auditorium except those contained in the boxes, must not be less than 32 inches from back to back and must be firmly secured to the floor. No seat in the auditorium shall have more than seven seats intervening between it and an aisle. The space occupied by each person shall be separated from the adjoining space by means of an arm or other suitable device.

11. Signs Over Exits—Over every exit there must be painted on the inside, in letters not less than 6 inches high, the word "Exit" in legibile type, and one red light or illuminated sign must be placed inside over each exit, and illuminated while the audience is present.

12. Floor Loads—The flooring of that portion of the building devoted to the uses or accommodation of the public must be of sufficient strength to bear safely a live load of 90 pounds per square foot.

13. Toilets—Toilets separate for sexes must be provided.

14. Fire Apparatus—Portable fire apparatus shall be provided of the following kind and number: Ten-quart capacity buckets, painted red, with the word "Fire" in black, the letters 4 inches high, to the number of 6 for places seating less than 300 without a gallery, and two additional if there be a gallery; to the number of ten in places seating over 300 persons, and four additional if there be a gallery. There shall be two buckets containing dry sand kept in the operating booth; approved fire extinguishers of 2½-gallon capacity of the regulation Fire Department pattern, of which 2 shall be on the main floor and 2 in the gallery, if there be one, and 1 in the operating booth; 4 pound flat head axes, 2 of which shall be on the main floor and 2 in the gallery, if there be one.

1. Lighting—Every portion of a moving picture theater, including exits, courts and corridors devoted to the uses or accommodation of the public, shall be so lighted by electric light during all exhibitions and until the entire audience has left the premises that a person with normal eyesight should be able to read the Snellen standard test type 40 at a distance of 20 feet, and type 30 at a distance of 10 feet; normal eyesight meaning ability to read type 20 at a distance of 20 feet in daylight. Cards showing types 20, 30 and 40 shall be displayed on the side walls, together with a copy of this paragraph of the ordinance.

2. Heating—When the temperature of the outdoor air is below 60 degrees F., the air in the theater, while an audience is present, shall be maintained at a temperature not lower than 62 degrees F. nor higher than 70 degrees F.

If gas stoves, oil stoves or other apparatus throwing off products of combustion are used to heat motion picture theaters, said products of combustion must be carried to the outside air by means of a fireproof flue or flues.

No radiator shall be placed in the aisles so as to lessen the width below the minimum requirement.

3. Ventilation—Motion picture theaters having less than 200 cubic feet of air space for each person, or motion picture theaters in which the outside window and door area is less than one-eighth of the floor area shall be provided with artificial means of ventilation which shall supply during the time the audience is present, at least 500 cubic feet of fresh air per hour for each person.

Motion picture theaters having more than 200 cubic feet of air space for each person, or which have outside windows and doors, the area of which is equal to at least one-eighth of the floor area, shall be provided with artificial means of ventilation, which shall be in operation when the outside temperature requires the windows to be kept closed, and which shall supply, during the time the audience is present, at least 500 cubic feet of fresh air per hour for each person. When the artificial ventilation is not in operation, ventilation by means of open doors and windows shall be sufficient to provide each person with 500 cubic feet of fresh air per hour.

Motion picture theaters having more than 1,000 cubic feet of air space for each person, and having outside windows and doors, the area of which is equal to at least one-eighth of the total floor area, shall not be required to have artificial means of ventilation, provided the air is thoroughly changed by freely opening doors and windows immediately before the admission of the audience, and at least every 4 hours thereafter.

No part of the fresh air supply required by any of the above paragraphs of this section shall be taken from any source containing vitiated air.

The area of outside doors and windows shall mean the area capable of being freely opened to the outside air for ventilation purposes.

When fresh air is supplied by means of ventilating openings, at least one inlet shall be situated at one end of the room, and at least one outlet at the other end of the room. Where exhaust or inlet fans are necessary, at least one of such fans shall be placed in an outlet opening. The inlet opening or openings shall be placed in the floor or within 2 feet from the floor, and the outlet opening or openings in the ceilings or within 2 feet from the ceiling. The inlet openings and their surroundings shall be kept free from dust so that the incoming air shall not convey dust nor stir up dust as it enters.

During the time the audience is present, the air in the theater shall be kept continuously in motion by means of fans to the number of at least 1 to every 150 persons. Such fans shall be placed in positions remote from the inlet and outlet openings. No person shall be exposed to any direct draft from any air inlet.

The booth in which the picture machine is operated shall be provided with an opening in its roof or upper part of its side walls, leading to the outdoor air. The vent flue shall have a minimum cross sectional area of 50 square inches and shall be fireproof. When the booth is in use, there shall be a constant current of air passing outward through said opening or vent flue, at the rate of not less than 30 cubic feet per minute.

The specifications of the above paragraph shall apply to portable booths and booths in open air theaters.

Motion picture theaters must be kept clean and free from dust.

The floors, where covered with wood, tiles, stone, concrete, linoleum, or other washable material, shall be mopped or scrubbed with water or swept with moisture or by some other dustless method, at least once daily, and shall be scrubbed with water and soap, or water and some other solvent substance at least once weekly.

Carpets, rugs and other fabric floor coverings shall be cleaned at least once daily by means of suction cleaning, beating or dustless sweeping. Curtains and draperies shall be cleaned at least once monthly by suction cleaning, beating or washing. Cornices, walls and other dust-holding places shall be kept free from dust by washing or moist wiping. The wood and metal parts of all seats shall be kept clean. Fabric upholstering of seats and railings and other fixed fabrics shall be cleaned by suction cleaning, or other dustless method, at least once monthly.

Through its Motion Picture Inspectors, as provided in sub-section 325B of this ordinance, the Bureau of Licenses shall inspect, subject to the authority of the Mayor, the character of exhibitions in motion picture theaters, and shall report to the Mayor any offense against morality, decency or public welfare contained in said exhibition.

352H.

All the provisions contained in this ordinance shall apply to existing places of entertainment, where motion pictures are exhibited under a common show license, in case the seating capacity be increased; and in case the seating capacity be not increased, all the provisions of this ordinance shall apply, except those provisions of sub-section 352D, designated as numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6, but the Bureau of Licenses shall have power in its discretion to enforce the provisions of said paragraph 3 of Section 352D as to exits and courts.

352I.

Existing places of entertainment seating 300 persons, or less, where motion pictures are exhibited in conjunction with any other form of entertainment, must comply, before a reissuance of its license, with the provisions of section 109 of the Building Code, covering theaters seating more than 300 persons. But if such existing place of entertainment discontinue all other form of entertainment except the exhibition of motion pictures, it may be licensed in accordance with the provisions of sub-section 352H.

With the exception of paragraph 7 of sub-section "352D," sub-sections "352A" to "352F," inclusive, and sub-sections "352H," "352I," "352K" and "352L" of this ordinance shall not apply to motion picture exhibitions with or without charge for admission, conducted under the direct management of educational or religious institutions, nor to motion picture exhibitions without charge for admission given or held not more than once a week in private residences or bona fide social, scientific, political or athletic clubs. Before motion pictures shall be exhibited in any of the places above mentioned, there shall be obtained from the Bureau of Licenses a permit for such exhibition. Before granting such permit, the Bureau of Licenses shall cause to be inspected the premises where such proposed exhibition will be held, and shall grant the permit if in its judgment the safety of the public be properly guarded, and provided that for an audience of more than 75 people all chairs or seats shall be securely fastened to the floor or fastened together in rows.

The Bureau of Licenses, at its discretion, shall specify the seating capacity for each open air motion picture theater. Aisles must be 4 feet wide, or wider, in the discretion of the Bureau of Licenses. At least two separate exits, remote from each other, shall be provided, and no exit shall be less than 5 feet in width; for every 25 persons to be accommodated in excess of 300, the total width of exits shall be increased 1 foot. All exits must be indicated by signs and red lights, and the doors must open outwardly. Seats must be stationary, with backs 32 inches apart, and so arranged that no seat shall have more than 7 seats intervening between it and an aisle. The floor must be constructed either of wood with sleepers or concrete, and must extend at least five feet from the seats on all sides, provided, however, that in the discretion of the Bureau of Licenses, a gravel floor may be substituted for wood or concrete. Chairs must be either securely fastened to wood or concrete floor, or all chairs in a row must be fastened together, and at least 4 rows must be securely fastened to one frame, except that where refreshments are served, tables and unattached chairs or benches used with them may be permitted.

Only sub-sections "352A," "352B," "352C," "352D," paragraphs 7 and 13; "352G," "352J" and "352K" of this ordinance shall apply to open air motion picture theaters.

352M.

This ordinance shall take effect thirty days after its approval by the Mayor. All other rules, regulations and ordinances inconsistent herewith and affecting buildings and places to be occupied as herein defined are hereby revoked.

"Nero and Britannicus"

A Three-Part, Colored, Eclectic Feature.

By Hugh Hoffman.

THERE comes now a handsomely colored historical production of the days of ancient Rome. It deals with the conflict between Nero and his brother, Britannicus. As a historical work it is entirely adequate and commendable so far as the actual working out of the story is concerned, but the question is going to arise in many thousands of minds as to who Britannicus might have been. Britannicus is not as familiar to the masses as his brother Nero. It is not generally known here that he invaded England as a Roman general and that the name of Britain is taken from the name of Britannicus. A historical picture should make all such points clear, and that is what this picture does not do. There is yet time for the Eclectic Film Company to obviate this shortcoming by the simple use of a sub-title or two at the beginning. Then everybody would be in the secret. There should be some brief information at the start as to the exact status of the two men, aside from their kinship, in order to give the true perspective to the subsequent events.

Otherwise the production is a glorious success. As a feature it is strong and dignified. The coloring, of course, adds that refreshing charm that makes even a commonplace picture seem better, but in this case it helps to put the effort in a class by itself. Even though no one were interested in the affairs of Nero and Britannicus, the production will command attention and respect by the masterful way in which it is done.

Scene from "Nero and Britannicus" (Eclectic).

All the parts are skillfully played by actors who are entirely sure of themselves. The spectator reclines with a sort of assurance that his pleasure is not going to be disturbed by some false move or jarring anachronism. On the other hand, he witnesses a most convincing impersonation of Nero. The changing moods, the self-indulgence, and inner thoughts of the Roman tyrant are drawn with wonderful power by the young actor who plays the part. Agrippina, the mother of Nero, is a character that is very well handled. Britannicus and Junia are a splendid pair of classic lovers. Narcissus presents rather too handsome and noble a mien for one to expect much treachery from him, but is no doubt true to life, as all villains are not ugly, and at times the greatest deceit lies behind a handsome face and form.

Briefly, the story deals with the poisoning of Britannicus by Nero, when Agrippina desires to set the former on the throne. Nero being her own son, she at first contrived to have him seated on the throne. He later grew tired of his mother's interference, and she, realizing that she could no longer control him, made plans to set Britannicus, her stepson, in the place of Nero. The tyrant became aware of this plan, and from that time made it his business to get Britannicus out of the way. This was accomplished by treachery. After joining the hands of Britannicus and Junia with his blessings, he holds forth the poison cup, and his brother drinks. The sacrifice of Junia, who drinks the dregs of the poison cup to join the man she loves, provides a strong finish for the picture. Any exhibitor can spread himself on this picture without much fear of exaggerating it, or of disappointing his patrons.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Suggests a List.

ADVERTISING films were taken up by the convention in one of the rare intervals when politics were not being played, but the matter went to committee and may lie dead and buried until the next convention. There is nothing to prevent the State League from taking the matter up individually, and for that matter there is nothing to prevent each individual manager acting as a committee of one.

W. A. Landon suggests a list to be prepared by our critical staff, but this idea does not seem to be wholly practical. When a regular release does contain advertising matter this fact is mentioned in the comment on the film, but no question can be made of the purely advertising film that is not a regular release. This is something that cannot be listed and that each manager must handle for himself; and these out and out advertisements are the ones that do the greatest harm.

During the Exposition we dropped in at the National Cash Register Theater to watch their display. We found it interesting as an advertisement, and so, apparently, did the others who patronized the theater all the week, but it was frankly an advertisement and not a disguised film and we liked it for what it was. But any one of the hundreds who packed the theater and enjoyed the performance would have resented precisely the same thing in a photoplay theater. In its proper place the advertising film is all right, but that place is not the photoplay theater, and no manager who is deserving of the name will permit such a display in his house. The Cash Register people make their displays in their own warerooms and do not intrude on the plays. Others, lacking this opportunity for display, seek to force their way into the theater. Don't wait for committee action. Do it yourself and do it now.

Free Auto Rides.

Do you think that you could afford to throw in an auto ride with a ten cent ticket? The Elite Theater, Rome, Ga., does if there are from five to twenty-five in the party. The answer is that the President of the Southern Amusement Company is also the owner of a garage and it costs nothing. The auto service is good only one way (to the theater), and possibly the garage not connected with a theater might find profit in the return fare at a time when the cars are apt to be idle. In case anyone wants to try the scheme here is the form.

Another scheme that the manager, J. B. Love, got up is a variant of the card familiar in many parts of the country in which a number is sealed on the card which shows a series of numbers. When the numbers have all been sold the seal is raised and a prize goes to the holder of the lucky number. In Mr. Love's scheme cuts of Vitagraph players take the place of numbers and a ticket is given to each purchaser, the winner also getting a book of tickets to the value of one dollar and an order for a photographic enlargement, the enlargement being made by a furniture store that probably looked to the frame sales for its return. Mr. Love writes:

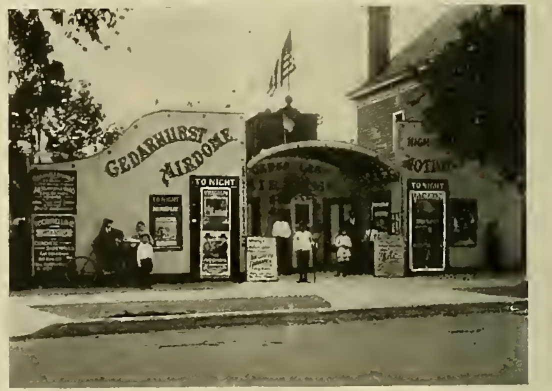
> While I have never sent you any "Dope" I never fail to look for the new ideas, in the way of advertising from my brother exhibitors, and I often find same a big help. I have been a constant reader and admirer of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD from its infancy, and I feel that it is a very important part of the equipment of any properly conducted moving picture theater. I am sending you a sample of a little stunt that I pulled off, and to say that I was surprised at the results in a financial way is putting it mildly. The card of the Vitagraph players. This card, which is self explanatory, is a winner. I have had a great number of people ask me how I could do it. Of course I don't believe in giving the world with a fence around it to get people in the theater, but I think that after you sum this card up, you will agree with me that it can be done. The cuts can't be considered in the expense of making the card as they can be used in so many ways, and in fact I did not get them for this special purpose. Neither can the expense of putting the tickets on the board be considered, as that is done by my cashier at no added expense. The book of tickets and the photo order were not intended to go on the card, but having them, I found that I could use them to an advantage. The books cost me $2.00 per M. to print. The inclosed photo cost me one cent each. The cards cost 2½ cents each. The net cost of handling 100 cards is $12.70. That includes the commission I pay the business house for pushing them off. I find no trouble in getting them placed in drug stores, restaurants, hotels, company stores at the factories, etc. In fact I put them everywhere. The first day I put out $100.00 worth of cards and half of that number was sold. I pay 10 per cent. to the house that handles the cards. I placed them in 40 different business places, the first day. That means that I had 40 different places begging people to visit the Elite. You will see that I get around 7½ cents admission. But I feel that I will get two people at 7½ cents where I would not get more than one for 10 cents. And then I get the people familiar with the players. The advertising I get out of it is worth the price. I have the room to accommodate the people and it costs me no more to show to two people than it does to one.

Mr. Love uses twenty small cuts, the same as are used in the Vitagraph bulletins. Since he gives full value for each ten cents paid, he is not amenable to state or federal lottery laws, and many persons will be induced to purchase tickets and attend the performance who would not otherwise be tempted. The winner is determined by a picture under the seal and these, apparently, are cut from the Vitagraph bulletins, though one of the cards may be cut up, instead. The twenty cuts on the sheet represent a face value of $2.

It is a good scheme to fill the house in the dull season and Mr. Love makes his debut in this department with full hands. We hope that he will acquire the habit and come in often.

A Nifty Airdome.

C. H. Pyatt has opened an airdome at Cedarhurst, Long Island, and shows an attractive front with plenty of paper and yet not too much. He has no small advertising to show as yet, but the cut is given to show what the advertising scheme looks like. He runs two Power machines to guard against breakdowns and shows five reels, one show a night, for ten cents. In the winter he runs the Lawrence Theater.



The Kind We Like.

Here's the sort of letter we like to get. It comes from Steve M. Farrar, of the Colonial Theater, Eldorado, Ill., who writes:

> As you were so kind as to point out the mistake in last offering (the big half-sheet newspaper ad.) I will send you a little hand bill that I used on the opening night at my new house here. Kindly point out the weak spots, for "I live to learn" and I learn something every Monday morning when the MOVING PICTURE WORLD arrives and I turn to your department. I often wonder if you know the good work you are doing for a lot of fellows that are trying to put over "big city shows in stick towns." I can see where my advertising copy has improved over fifty per cent. in the past year; some of this came from experience, but I will be honest and give your department credit for most of it.
> You will note that I have made a change since I last wrote you and that I am now in an incorporated company. We operate seven shows, five shown above, and two here, one of which is the Colonial, and we are building another house here, which will open in November. I am going to come out then with a little weekly program that will make the other fellows hustle.

> I wish to commend you on your stand on the advertising reel, and at the same time tell you that we are with you, to the last ditch.

We like to know, now and then, that we are doing good. This department is not conducted solely for the money that is paid us for the work. We like it and we like to know that it helps the man who has not been so long under the collar as we have.

Programs the Thing.

We think that if Mr. Farrar gets out a program it will be a good one, and a good program is one of the most valuable forms of advertising. One of the Brooklyn papers uses the line "The paper that goes home nights" and this might well be adapted to the program.

"Come and freeze" is the inviting line that winds up a brief description of the Colonial. It is set in ten point type. A line like that should have been run up to twenty-four or even thirty-six point these hot nights. It is as valuable as the announcement of the feature film and just as likely to win the business.

One of the things that Mr. Farrar will find out is that a printer looks to make a job of a bill where a manager looks for something with a punch. If he will take one of the bills he sends us, he will note that the lines under the date line, commencing "We take pleasure in extending to you a cordial invitation," are set in a heavy line condensed type. A condensed type is one that is closed up to get plenty of letters in a given space and this gets the two sides of a letter so close together and the letters in a group so close that the line looks like a black smudge until you come close to it. We like big black type for the punch lines, but a condensed face should be a light line where a condensed face must be used. We think that three lines of ten point extended would be more easily read than two lines of eighteen point condensed, and to get a line read is the main object of a bill.

Getting further down the bill we can see where other gains could be made. There is one section that reads that "The offering will be THREE REELS OF SPECIAL PICTURES featuring the Rex Premier Production in two parts: The Dragon's Breath."

This is well worded but not so well set. "The offering will be" could have gone in eight point, giving "Three reels of special pictures" a whole line to itself in extended type instead of half a line in condensed. This would give about five times the display in the same space. It is not an easy matter to get the compositor to get out the values unless the lines are clearly marked. It is best to pull up the points and then talk over with the foreman of the shop the best type faces to use. Let him mark the faces in and add his type knowledge to your appreciation of values. Then you get the ideal combination. The bill in question is well written, but it is hurt by the display. At that it is above the average, but we think that it could be made better.

Picking Up the Points.

The great idea in writing a bill is to get the big things in the big type and then pick type that can be read without an effort. You don't advertise to reach the man who would come anyway and who merely reads the bill to see what the attraction is. The advertisement is to appeal to the man who doesn't intend to come but who has his mind changed for him by your argument. Such a man on a July day would be more attracted by the invitation "Come and freeze" than by the fact that it was the Rex feature that is to be shown. He may not know the Rex and he may not care about Dragons' breaths, but that breeze thing is what catches him and he reads on to find that the story sounds like an unusual picture, so he decides to go down and look at the picture and incidentally find out how much of a liar you are about the temperature, so get all your big talking points in such shape that while the eye is absorbing the icy fact it can take the rest in almost unconsciously. The uninterested man will not labor over type that is hard to read. Make it easy for him and the rest is easy for you.

Some Buhl Stuff.

W. J. Sergel, of the Rex Theater, Buhl, Idaho, sends in the first issue of the Rex News along with a card that brought them business, so much in fact, that they took a repeat. It is in red and blue on yellow card stock. Two Chap Book indicators point down to the copy that looks something like this:

P. T. Barnum

Conceded by all to be America's greatest showman, never in all his life provided a more complete program or a better time than has been provided for those who come to

BUHL

July 4 and 5

This was used for the town celebration, the first card substituting the name of the house for the name of the town. Barnum was one of the best exponents of what is known as Bull Con and we think the combination of Barnum and Buhl is particularly appropriate.

The Program.

Mr. Sergel says the first issue of the program is not all that he wants it to be, but we do not see that much excuse is needed. It is a baby yet, but there are some good lines and we particularly like this paragraph from the back page:

> There is no reason why Buhl should not have the finest City Park in Southern Idaho. The Rex Theater can be procured at any time to raise funds for improving the City Park, or for any other worthy public enterprise. To make a town worth living in is a mighty good policy—especially when you have to live in the town.

Showing public spirit is one of our fads because we know that it pays, and since it does pay it pays to come right out and get down on the record as being strong for the town. They also use a variant of the familiar "If the show pleases you tell your friends, if not tell us."

> If the Rex show pleases you knock on your neighbor's door when you go home and say so. If to the first knock there is no answer, knock again. But if the show doesn't please you—don't knock. Tell us.

They get a two weeks' program on a single page, announcing two features, and will come out only every second week for the present. Among the improvements we would suggest a larger type for the heading of the first page and perhaps a more fanciful face. They use a twenty-four point gothic. It is a little too severe. We would also suggest that they date as well as number each issue, using a comprehensive date, "June 30 to July 12," instead of the actual date of issue. This is better than "For the weeks of" and the date since it lasts right down to Saturday. They announce a question box. We shall be glad to help out if help is needed.

An Air Boat; Not Ship.

> I had this picture taken on one of Sterling's big days, the opening of the North Sterling reservoir, and what you see suspended from electric sign is a float which I used in parade. It is made in shape of a boat with a banner on each side and was carried by two small boys. Of course after parade I thought I might get double use out of it by using it in the manner that you see in picture.
> The committee in charge of celebration had moving pictures taken of all the events and I had the film on last Monday night, drawing a large crowd. There were hundreds of people in picture and naturally would be anxious to see themselves in movies.
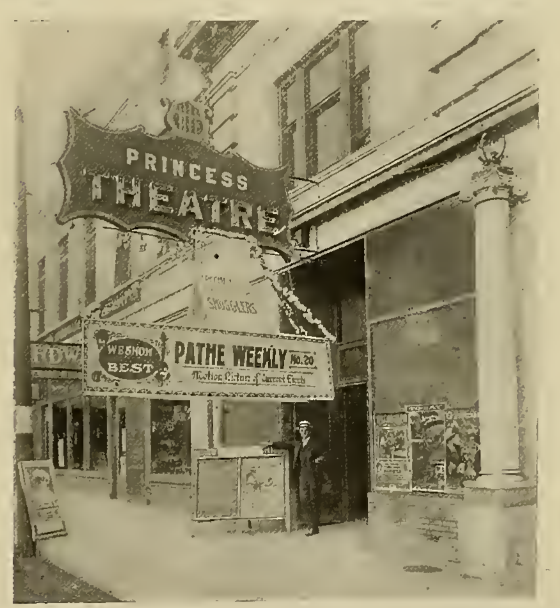
> Just a word about my program; I use General Film Company's service, which to my notion cannot be excelled; have an eight piece orchestra and my house seats three hundred and seventy-five.

The growing use of the local motion picture is one of the signs of the times and it is a big business getter. If you cannot arrange for a picture in motion get the local photographer to make a series of pictures and then show the slides. Tell him if he will make the pictures and the slides you will advertise the former by means of the latter. If you can make a good bargain you might even get a commission on the sale of the photographs. All the people will come to see the slides and an announcement that "Large copies of these pictures may be had of Blank for fifty cents each" will not only bring a return to the photographer, but bring people in who may stay to pose for their portraits.



Lectured the Fly Pest.

Harry G. Waldron, of Langdon, S. D., has been using post cards for advertising purposes with good results. The Fly Pest was a recent feature lectured by a local physician and former college professor. That is the sort of thing that counts.

Doing Better.

The Pearce special announcements seem to be always improving. The most recent is the program of a musicale at the Tudor Theater, New Orleans. It is a fine piece of printing and shows what can be done without the aid of Old English. Appropriately enough the name Tudor is set in Tudor Black with Cheltenham medium for a body type.

Pulitzer a Publisher.

Benny Pulitzer, the publicity man of the Pearce theaters, New Orleans, has become a publisher and Pulitzer and Stier will publish the Pearce Bulletin as an independent venture. To signalize the new departure he runs an item that refers to this paper as "The MOVING PICTURE WORLD, published in Chicago," etc. We refuse to go to Chicago. On the other hand he is using smaller type and this makes for a better looking sheet.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Questions Are Free.

Every week we receive an inquiry from someone who apologizes for asking questions. There is no apology needed. The Inquiry Department was started to help the man who wants to be helped, and so long as he asks questions intelligently and does not demand a reply by mail, he is welcome to ask questions in reasonable number and as often as he wants. We cannot undertake to reply by mail whether a stamped and addressed envelope accompanies the inquiry or not, but reply through these columns is made within two weeks of the receipt of the letter, sometimes within ten days, and that is not so very long to wait. Come in as often as you like and offer no excuse.

Read the Post.

We do not often offer free advertisements, but if you are interested in photoplay writing you can get some vivid glimpses of behind the scenes in some recent issues of the Saturday Evening Post. The Post has used some weirdly unique picture stuff in the past, but the present series is not only correct in coloring, but it throws some interesting sidelights on the photoplay editor and the studio writer.

Once More.

The "positively last time" that the Photoplay Author was going to be late rivals the farewell appearances of some famous actress in point of numbers. The fact is that T. E. Letendre has been wresting with a number of things at once, and all suffered. He has disposed of the sheet to the Home Correspondence School, of Springfield, Mass., and the June-July number is just out with the promise that this is positively the last time that it will happen. The double issue will interest writers in that it carries a photographic reproduction of one of this writer's scripts after the director, Arthur D. Hotaling, in this instance, had finished it. It is the first time that we know of that the actual script has been reproduced in cut instead of type and with the director's markings. It may interest some that our classical features adorn the first page—more or less.

The magazine, by the change, becomes the organ of a school, but we do not understand that it is to be used as an organ in the sense that the Photoplay Dramatist is run for the glorification of the Nelson person. The standing of the school—of which the photoplay course is but a line—of Dr. Esenwein and of Arthur Leeds seem a guarantee that the magazine will still be run as a magazine for photoplay writers and not as an advertising circular.

Live in Evansville, Ind.?

If you live in Evansville, Ind., you can find a kindred spirit in a former actor who is now turning his stage technique into that of the studio by writing photoplays. His address will be sent if you want to share his studies.

Stealing Candy from a Child.

Stealing candy from a child is supposed, by popular acceptance, to be next worst to stealing the pennies from a dead man's eyes, but stealing candy is mild alongside this advertisement from a Toledo paper:

> And Incidentally Make $10 to $100.
> To the Boys and Girls of Toledo:
> Vacation time is here. Hurray! Hurray!
> Give the boys and girls something to do that will make it pay. Don't spend all your time at the "movies," but learn to weave a "plot" for a movie and receive big money for a very little effort on your part.
> For the next seven days I will give my complete course of instructions. How to Become a Scenario or Photo Play Writer. A perfect photo play as a copy and a list of the best film producers where you can market your photo play when completed. Now, remember for the next seven days only I will give this copyright course to any school boy or girl for $2.00.
> Don't wait and don't delay, as this offer will not appear again. For all further information, call or write.

The Right Idea.

Charles D. Smith writes in appreciation of this page and says: "I have made up my mind to sell a play before I quit and when I sell one, I won't want to quit."

That's the right spirit. Keep at it until you have made a sale and you'll keep on keeping at it. Do not expect to sell your first play, or even your tenth, but go at the work with the intention of some day making a sale and some day you will, if you possess any imagination at all.

Originality.

Lots of writers, including the Film Man on the Dramatic Mirror, complain that editors discourage originality and will have nothing to do with the really novel plot. We do not agree with this statement. We think that most editors welcome originality and strive to encourage the man who can think out novel ideas. The trouble is that two things must be carried in mind. The cost of making the picture must not be excessive and it must be sufficiently simple to be within the grasp of the average spectator.

The editor of one of the most successful children's pages ever put out by a newspaper syndicate used to judge the value of puzzles by trying to solve them mentally. If he could solve the diamonds and squares without putting them down on paper, he figured that his average reader would be able to get them. It's the same way with film stories. The editors are not buying stories with plots so intricate that they will appeal only to the higher grades of attendance—and incidentally the critics. They are buying stuff that will please eighty per cent. of the audiences and leave the problems and the involved plots for others.

No one is in business purely as a diversion. He is in business to make money. The editors know that their employers cannot sell stories in which the spectator is kept so busy following the story that he cannot enjoy either the action or the plot. He tries to be as novel as he can without getting a story too intricate to be grasped with ease from the action, and so it happens that very often the crackajack story is turned down because it is too complex and the more simple, but, perhaps, less original idea, is taken up. This is not a sign that originality is not wanted. It merely points to the varieties of originality.

We wrote a little farce last winter that just barely got on the screen. It was not great, but it was a pleasant little thing and well produced. It was titled "Building a Trust" and was produced by the Lubin company. It is rather lively in action, but not heavy in idea. An Irish washerwoman and a Chinese laundryman constantly scrap. The woman has the best of it because the patrolman on the beat is himself an Irishman. Presently a darkey lady down the street opens a laundry. Past differences are forgotten and the Irishwoman and the Chinaman join hands against their competitor.

That's farcical enough, and yet it has the same basis as a score of plays dealing with the oppressions of the trusts and other plays dealing with racial prejudice. Dozens of race prejudice plays are written but not produced because of their bias. Several trust plays have been done and many more have been turned back to the writers. The idea of making it into a farce was more original and so it sold in that form. It gave the audiences, the children and the ignorant something to laugh at, and yet, below the surface, there was thought and satire.

This is a rather crude illustration, perhaps, but it gives a hint. Originality should not be directed toward getting so far away from the common things of life as to require a highly trained intellect to appreciate the idea. It must appeal to the children and to those with the intelligence of children, and yet it should be capable of appealing to the better informed as well. If editors cannot get that, they have to take the same old themes, but they are looking for originality of the right sort and are taking it when they can find it and asking for more.

Jones Should Worry.

Marc Edmund Jones is worrying because of the influx of fiction writers who may now make good but shows stories glut the market. Get these few remarks:

> Just now the thing that worries me is the invasion of the Photoplay field by literary writers of all kinds, who, with a literary reputation, get a price I cannot get, and, while they are responsible for some big pictures, yet sell a lot of stuff that I couldn't sell, and wouldn't claim if I wrote it. This gluts the market, and it looks as if the Photoplay writer, trained in the work, is being sidetracked somewhat for the newcomers in the field. And so here's my latest stunt:
> I figure that photoplay writing is a better training for fiction writing than when things are the other way around. And so, if the literary writer is going to come in and "crab" the Photoplay game, it is up to the Photoplay writer to retaliate—whence enters little Willie! With unbecoming lack of modesty, and the rest of it, I hereby give notice that, as in one year I have entered the Photoplay game as an amateur, and risen to a position with the leaders, so now, in my second year, I am going to sail into the fiction writing game and SHOW UP the gosh-dinged bunch of writers that have come in to help me eat my meat. A year from now I undertake to have as big a name as a fiction writer as has any fiction writer that has entered the Photoplay game. And, so that the humiliation may be the greater, I hope they will bear in mind that the man undertaking to do this cannot boast a high school education; will have to write enough photoplays between to eat; and is one who has never written anything for publication, outside of the Photoplay field and in non-payment amateur work. If I can scrape a little money together, I'll publish the challenge in the Mirror. In the meantime—THE FIGHT IS ON! Let all Photoplaywrights enter the fray.

We like Marc Edmund Jones and we like a man with nerve, but we do not see why he or others should worry. If the fiction writer can come along and raise the standard of the product, he should be made welcome. If he cannot do as well as photoplay man he will not stay long enough in the game to hurt it. We have written several honest-to-goodness magazine stories and more than a mile of newspaper syndicate fiction, but we are not working on that end now because we can make more money with photoplays than with fiction, notwithstanding the fact that there is a reasonably good demand for our fiction work.

There is no reason why the writer who does nothing but photoplays should not try fiction. He cannot write plays all day long and he can not write stories when he cannot write plays, but while photoplay writing is a help to the would-be fiction writer, the photoplaywright is apt to trust too much to action, just as the fiction writer who essays photoplay trusts too much to his style.

We hope that Jones makes good his modest little brag, but we would remind him that some pretty big names are found tied to photoplays now and then and that style is not a thing to be acquired overnight. It is here that the photoplay makes its strongest appeal to many and in particular to the man who has ideas but who can never hope to develop a style that will give literary expression to his thoughts. In photoplay the style is not required and the idea can be realized from any simple but complete description. The form of photoplay may be acquired in a reasonably brief time. Style is a hard master.

After all, we think that perhaps Jones should worry if he wants to make good.

Seeking a Pull.

Just the other day we received a letter from a man who wrote that he wanted to get in touch with a reader and that an acquaintance had suggested us. It developed that he was looking for an editorial reader because he had a friend who had written a number of good scripts but had found that his fine stuff was lost in the general ruck. We told him a few things about that ruck that should hold him and others for a time. He was looking for a pull because he knew perfectly well that his stories were not purchased merely because their excellence was not perceived. And this on top of the fact that one of the best known writers has marketed sixteen stories under assumed names in studios where his own name is not welcome. We sent out a story the other day. We gave a friend the plot and when he failed to swing it we wrote it for him as an object lesson. It was sent to a company we sell to and though it was by a writer entirely unknown to them and came into the studio in the daily mail the same as any other story, it was bought and the author was paid precisely the same money we would have received had we sent it in ourselves with such advantage as may accrue from personal friendship and long establishment.

Under such a circumstance it is idiotic to argue that the outsider stands no chance. He stands, in most studios, precisely the same chance as the "inside writer" if he can do his work as well, but the man who feels that he is being discriminated against is never going to get very far into the game because he is partly a fool to start with. If you are headed in that direction purge your mind of that belief. Don't cry that the other man has the inside track. Work to make your work as good as that of the other man and you'll get as much money and sell as much stuff, but remember that the other man worked hard for his success and you must expect to do the same.

Spelling and Letters.

Did it ever occur to you that spelling and letter writing are part of the study of photoplay?

Three letters this week commence with an entirely improper salutation and half of them are not quite right. Perhaps it may seem odd to you to commence a letter this way:

Vitagraph Company of America,
Dear sir:

and yet dozens do precisely that. The Vitagraph company is not a sir nor yet madame. It is a company of persons and since there is nothing to show to the contrary, it is presumed that they are men, therefore, "Dear sirs:" is a more correct form of greeting. It may seem a small thing, but your letter will come to the attention of persons whose familiarity with business forms will cause them to notice such small matters and judge you accordingly.

Perhaps you are familiar with the forms, but if you are not get some book that will give you the correct information and make certain that you are right.

Another matter is your name. If you lack a printed letter head give your name and address every time that you write. No matter if you have been writing the same company for a year, give your name and address just as though this was your first letter. And do not trust to your signature for the name. It may be plain to you but puzzling to a stranger. In the lower left hand corner type your full name and address. It may save trouble sometime. At no time can it possibly do you harm.

Perhaps you used to be a crack speller at school, but isn't it just barely possible that since your schooldays some errors have crept in? An astonishingly large number of persons write "excepted" when they mean "accepted." This doesn't make your script either better or worse, but editors are just foolish enough to think that the person who hopes his script will be "excepted" doesn't know enough to write a script. Cast is too frequently spelled "Caste," which is quite another word, and "develope" instead of "develop" is used more frequently than it should be and by many who show other indications of the possession of more than average intelligence. Only the ignorant and the truly great can afford to ignore the rules of grammar and spelling. Get a dictionary and keep it handy. Consult it when you are the least bit in doubt.

A well written letter is a good advertisement. A poorly written one is still an advertisement, but it does the writer no good. Do not be content with your work until you are positive that you cannot do better.

And above all things, do not try to be clever in a business letter. If you are writing on a business matter, be businesslike. If you can write jokes sell them to the comic papers; do not give them to editors who are too busy to appreciate them. Later on, if you can establish relations with an editor, you can use your own judgment, but the would-be smart letter is a nuisance and the "of course I do not have to tell you," or "you can see for yourself that this is my first script," long ago lost all trace of novelty. Be brief and businesslike and win appreciation that will react in favor of your script, that is, if you have to write a letter at all. Most scripts do not need to be accompanied by a letter. They do need to be accompanied by correct spelling.

Circle a Straight Line.

The first meeting of the Washington Photoplay Circle resolved itself into a straight line before one of those places where you set the glass down, but William B. Courtney, who organized the circle, thinks that others are coming in, when the circle will Bryanize to grape juice. Mr. Courtney will come back to the vicinity of New York in the fall and join the regular Inquest Club. He writes that he would have joined last year, only he was but seventeen and did not think that he belonged with the older men.

That is precisely the idea of the Inquest Club and its circles. Those who have learned, whether they are men or striplings, were willing to sit in with those who were willing to study and give the benefit of their experience to those who lacked it. They were all helped along the road and, in turn, were willing to help those who came after. Meantime if you want to join the Washington circle speak up, that it may be started before Mr. Courtney leaves.

Wait a Few Weeks.

We are getting a little bit tired of getting letters from people saying that they do not see that the Lubin pictures are any better than they were before the new scheme of leaving the development of the script to the editorial staff went into effect.

To head off additional letters we would explain that it will be a long time before the decks are cleared of the old material. The stories that are being released now and that probably will be released in August and September were made before the new scheme went into effect. Some of the old stories will hold over for six or nine months yet. Stuff made two months ago is not even scheduled yet—and we have the schedules almost to the end of August right here on the desk. The announcement was made when the change went into effect. It is not probable that the results will be really apparent before the end of the year. We do not see why it should worry the photoplay writers, anyhow. They are selling the same volume of stuff to Lubin as ever.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE.

R. F. K.—The K-B Identifier advises us that the child in "The Sea Dog" is Pinkie Thompson's sister, Thelma. Pinkie played the part of the nurse in the picture.

RUBENA—We cannot give the names of Pathe players. E. R. Phillips is the Vitagraph player. He is still with the company for all we know, but it's a big company to keep track of. Sydney Drew is John Drew's brother. He was a vaudeville star for many years, and has starred in his wife's play, "Billy." Your last suggestion is interesting, but not in accordance with facts.

H. A. K.—When the players hustle through the scene at lightning speed, the effect is called "accelerated action." They work at normal speed, but with the use of a special attachment the camera records only every fourth picture, and the action that takes place in four seconds is shown in one. Where one scene dissolves into the next, it is called a "fade." Be easy on fade stuff, as it makes a lot of extra trouble and editors are not eager to find extra trouble.

A. R. G.—We cannot identify the Pathe players. In future name the roles played by the players you are interested in. Do not ask for entire casts "in their principal order." Have a heart for a poor Answers Man this hot weather, and do a retail business.

W. L.—We have no cast for that American production. Kempton Green is the Lubin player you ask for.

MURPHY—"Les Miserables" was written up in the issue for April 26th. The regular synopsis appears in the same issue. Imp does not list the cast you ask for. Miss Mabel Trunelle had the title role in "The Governess." The companies you name all purchase scripts, though Biograph buys very little from the outside market, as their needs are peculiar. You are wrong in stating that Selig is not in the market.

PAT—The Biograph Identifier does not know the girl in "The Sorrowful Shore." Perhaps someone will supply this information. Henry Carey was the father. Mrs. Grace Henderson was the boy's mother in "The Unveiling."

RUBENA—Anthony has dropped out again, possibly because we were so unsympathetic about his hopeless passion. Don't rest on one play. Keep on writing. That's the way to get to a sale eventually.

J. C.—Letters, telegrams and newspaper clips are "inserts." Busts are small sections of some large action. Where you number words in leaders and inserts, you give the number of words at the time and on the front page state the total number of words in leaders and the total number of words in letters. You do not combine them. The numbering of the words is not essential.

N-CHI.—We do not know the company, but we do not advise sending scripts to any company that does not regularly release its product through one of the established releasing channels. They may be all right, but the odds are much against their financial success.

JEFF—Give name and address next time. Not having seen the film, we cannot explain the shift in color. It may have been caused by a bad splice, which would reverse the red and green screens, or it may have been a flare of color that for a moment tinged the garment. We have already passed up that second question.

LOMA—Your questions are not the sort that we answer in this department. We have nothing to do with the personal affairs of the players.

A. J. H.—Yale Boss appears in "All on Account of a Portrait," and "The Dream Fairy," during July. Both have been released already. Miss Hawley is in Philadelphia at present. We lack the Essanay cast.

C. H. N.—In "His Mother's Son," the Identifier fails to name the cafe proprietor, who is an "extra" recently promoted to parts. Perhaps some one can supply the name. Walter Lewis, now with Reliance, was Miss Gish's father in "My Hero." In "Feud in the Kentucky Hills," Henry Walthall was the psalm singer, and Walter Miller his younger brother. Miss Mary Pickford was the girl. Alfred Paget was the outcast Indian in "The Chief's Blanket."

J. F. G.—In "There Were Hoboes Three," Miss Florence Lee was the girl, and Miss Sylvia Ashton the fat woman. The three brothers in "Just Gold," were Alfred Paget, Charles West, and a player as yet unplaced. The Randolphs, in "Two Social Calls," were Allen Holuba and Miss Dorothy Phillips.

Operators Attention.

WITH this issue I will begin to fulfill the promise made to Toronto, by beginning a series of questions which will, no doubt, last for many months and perhaps even a full year. As I have previously pointed out, unions could reap very great advantage by entering into this matter along the line already suggested, offering suitable prizes to the members for the best series of answers to the questions.

I wish it to be distinctly understood that every one of these questions will be thoroughly practicol. There won't be a single "catch" question in the whole list. Some of them may seem very simple, yet perhaps there is more in the question than appears on the surface. For instance, one question will ask you to define alternating current, telling exactly what you understand by the term alternating. Now this seems simple enough, but still, the answer that really counts is one which is so worded that it proves the writer to have a comprehensive understanding of the exact action of alternating current, as distinguished from direct current, and his answer may be made much more clear by explaining the difference between 60 cycle, 25 cycle and 130 cycle.

The answer which evidently is taken bodily from a text book ought not to count. The student should, in all cases, answer in his own words, carefully keeping away from stereotyped replies. As I said in the beginning, the man who can give comprehensive answers to all of the questions propounded will have demonstrated that he is thoroughly versed in both the practical and technical side of projection. The answers to questions will appear one month after the questions themselves are published; that is to say, if we publish four questions this week, then four answers will be published four weeks thereafter.

The questions concerning generators (dynamos) may seem, at first glance, to be irrelevant, but this is not true, since hundreds of theaters have already installed generating plants, or motor-generator sets, and, beyond any question of a doubt, thousands of other theaters will do the same thing, therefore it behooves the operator to have at least a very complete rudimentary knowledge of the action and the care of the electric dynamo.

I would suggest that local unions take action and appoint a committee to whom their members shall return the answers to the various questions from week to week. Possibly the union committee could offer prizes to those making the best general average. The answers of members could be posted up in the meeting hall each week, and then when the answers arrive they could also be posted, so that there could be no accusations of favoritism made against the committees. The posting of the answers of the members would also stir up much exceedingly valuable discussion.

Questions.

1. Name the different parts of an electric generator (dynamo) and explain how the current is generated.
2. What purpose does the field rheostat of an electric generator serve?
3. What do you understand by a shunt wound dynamo?
4. What do you understand by a compound wound dynamo?

Notice.

There may be some slight delay in answering correspondence while I am away at the Seattle Convention during the month of July. I trust that, inasmuch as this is the first vacation I have had in three years (If you can call it a vacation), you will be patient. My mail will be forwarded and I will keep up with things as closely as I can.

Flicker.

Mr. M. L. Johnston, Cleveland, Tenn., says:

> We are using two Simplex machines with a G. E. Rectifier. Our light seems to be perfect, and our picture excellent, with the exception of a little flicker. I am running a fifteen minute picture, which is the highest speed of the motor drive. The shutter is in line all right, but it seems as though one can see it revolving on the screen. We have a mirror screen and a throw of about 72 feet. We ordered one of your new Handbooks some time ago, but have not yet received it. Can you advise me what to do with regard to the flicker?

I am afraid I can't, brother Johnston. You are using a mirror screen, and probably a pretty strong light, and, under these conditions flicker can only be eliminated, when running at normal speed, by the use of a three-wing shutter, each blade of which is of approximately the same width. You could probably reduce the flicker somewhat by reducing the amperage. You could also reduce it by increasing the speed, but you are now running a little above normal, provided you mean fifteen minutes to 1,000 feet of film, and any further increase of speed would not be desirable, except on some scenes. Many scenes require a slower speed than you are now using in order to bring out their full value. As to the Handbook, I will have the matter looked up. There should have been no delay in its receipt.

Baltimore Operators' Ball Team.

Baltimore Operators' Baseball Team.

He also sends a picture of the Washington operators' ball team, composed of members of Local 224, I. A. T. S. E., Washington, D. C., which is also reproduced herewith.

Washington Operators' Baseball Team.

Brother Finn says he is going to open his heart and contribute something of interest to the department before long. He says that the Baltimore bunch send their best regards, and winds up with a flourish by saying that the game was pulled off on Sunday, June 1st and the score was 5-3, in favor of Washington, the game being played in the Capital city.

Wants Massachusetts Regulations.

Mr. George H. Clay, Secretary Local 279, I. A. T. S. E., Houston, Texas, writes:

> Just a few lines to ask for information. I would like to find out for myself and the rest of the boys here, what the Massachusetts state license and examination for operators is. I know it was in The World some time ago, but have not that copy now. We have a good local started here, comprising a membership of thirty-two.

Your question is somewhat ambiguous, friend Clay, but I presume the examination the Massachusetts State Examiner gives applicants for moving picture license is what you want, in which case it will be impossible to accommodate you, since the Massachusetts examiner has no set series of questions. I will refer your letter to the Boston local and ask them to give you any available information. The Boston examination is what is commonly called a "hard one," but in reality it is not at all hard, provided the applicant understands his business. The Massachusetts examiner insists that the applicant possesses bona fide knowledge, and unless he does he cannot get by. With this I am heartily in accord.

From Texas.

John A. Hale, Tyler, Texas, contributes the following:

> I haven't noticed anything from this State, so I will see if I can't wake the boys up. I have a proposition which has puzzled me. Am running an Edison machine and a Power's Six. The show opens at 1:30 sharp. When I start, the pictures are not steady, but from about 5 o'clock until closing time they are as steady as anyone could wish. I have not been able to figure this out, though I have been operating for the past seven years. I haven't secured one of the Handbooks yet. We are trying to organize a local here, but not, as yet, got it going. I inclose a picture of the Hippodrome, where I work. The only draw-back to this house is the operating room, which is only 6 x 8 x 7½ high. We use a mercury arc rectifier and get a very nice 14 foot picture. The service is licensed. That's about all I know worth writing. It isn't much, but I wanted to let the boys know that Texas was still on the map.

I am afraid you haven't watched the Department as closely as you might, Friend Hale. We have letters from Texas every little while. In fact, the Texas boys seem to be live wires. As to the picture being unsteady, your description is not complete enough for me to form any opinion. What do you mean by "not steady?" That expression might cover a multitude of sins, but I think you must refer to the light, meaning that it fluctuates. Give us a little more data and we will see what we can make out of it. Better invest in a Handbook.

Tempering Condensers.

Mr. C. A. Smith, Mound Valley, Kansas, who is employed in a glass factory in the day time and as an operator three evenings a week, says he has a scheme for tempering condensers. He writes as follows:

> Population of Mound Valley is about 900 and we do a nice business three times a week. Condensers may be tempered as follows: First, burn about a half bale of good hay which has no weeds in it; burn it in a metal tub, or in some way so you can save the ashes. Next take some asbestos mill board and make a box with a two inch hole in its side, and one in the top. Now take large gasoline torches and heat the lenses to a straw color, taking care not to get them too hot. Put about six inches of the hay ashes in a bucket, on top of which lay one of the condensers. Cover this with about two inches of ashes and then lay the other condenser in and cover it up with ashes. Then let them set for thirty hours before uncovering. If they are uncovered too soon it does no good to temper them. The longer it takes a piece of glass to cool off, the better it is tempered. The ashes from hay are as fine as flour, and very light, which excludes all air. A finely tempered piece of glass will not break if allowed plenty of room for expansion. If you have a condenser that is too large it can be filed down by using an 8 inch flat file, kept thoroughly wet with turpentine; but the file must be new and sharp.

The one flaw in your directions, Friend Smith, is that you do not say what kind of hay, viz.: Alfalfa or timothy. Perhaps, however, it makes no difference. I should say burning half a bale of hay for tempering two lenses would be rather expensive, unless the ashes can be used again. Other than this I would not care to comment. Any of you who care to give it a tryout may do so. Most certainly neighbor Smith's statement that slow cooling is what tempers glass is perfectly correct. That is the process which is called "annealing."

A Suggestion to Exchanges.

> In the interest of better projection I would like to make the following suggestion to film exchanges. It is an unquestioned fact that every time a film is rewound it is more or less scratched in the process, therefore, why cannot exchanges save one re-winding by requesting operators to leave the film on the take-up reel when it is sent in. This would not only save the operator labor but would also save exchange inspectors one re-winding and eliminate just that much wear and tear on the film. It would also save considerable of the inspector's time, which could be devoted to more thorough inspection. Now a few words in regard to the convention: Why not allow some of the non-union operators who, like myself, live in a town too small to have a union, have their say? Many of the small-town men are excellent operators and as good as the best and, I dare say, that most of us would, if given a reasonable opportunity, get into the organization on the double quick. What I would suggest would be that the convention make provision so that operators of small towns would be permitted, upon passing examination, to join the local nearest to them and, to prevent discrimination of locals towards applicants, let President Shay prepare a list of examination questions and blanks, the same to be supplied to all locals. I believe that some such plan would be of much greater value than would three or four organizers, as well as far cheaper. Personally, I would like to see thorough organization. I would like to see every operator who is able to qualify given an opportunity to join the union and, like Kansas City, I believe the operators should have unrestricted jurisdiction over all spots, floods and other lamps in front of the curtain line of every theater.

Your suggestion as to leaving the film on the take-up reel seems to me to be a good one. I can see no objection to it and, as you say, it would save both labor and wear and tear on the film. As to your remarks concerning the union, they are what one might naturally expect from one who has not had the opportunity to study the question from all angles. I believe the convention will do a great deal toward solving the problem of taking in small-town operators who can prove up as to ability and reliability, but very likely we will not be able to get everything we would like all at one time. I, myself, am a delegate to the convention, and you can rest assured I will do everything that lies within my power to forward the interest of the operator. I think we shall be able to accomplish a great deal. I certainly hope so. The trouble is, however, that this seemingly simple problem of the small-town men presents a surprising number of angles when one comes to study it and it may take two or three years yet to get the whole thing straightened out in a thoroughly satisfactory manner.

From Nova Scotia.

Mr. A. B. Spooner, Parrsboro, Nova Scotia, writes:

> I noticed in the Moving Picture World of June 14th, that you were somewhat disappointed at the way the boys expressed their opinions in regard to tail-pieces in split reels, and in regard to your examination questions. Personally, I did not give the tail-piece idea much thought, except to think that you had the right idea, but I very much regret that I was so careless as to overlook the fact that you wanted an expression of the readers' views regarding the examination questions. I took it for granted that you were going to institute that feature, and have been watching for it; for that would be a great chance for the isolated operator to cross examine himself. I am one of the many operators who work in a small town where there is only one picture house, and all the projection education I get is through the department. I hope to make an effort to get into the I. A. T. S. E., as soon as I get back into the United States (I am a Yank), and am trying to learn all there is to know about projection, although you can see what up hill work it is in a tank town. Nevertheless many travelling men and tourists say I give the best picture in Nova Scotia, and some say in the Maritime Provinces.

No, I was not particularly disappointed, Friend Spooner. I only meant to call attention to the fact that if you expect to get attention you have got to get into the game. I cannot do it all. I must have your hearty co-operation in some things, in order to make them a success. The questions will start shortly, if the first lot is not in this week.

Weak in Arithmetic.

Los Angeles, California, writes:

> On page 18 of the "Hand Book" on figuring "Ohm's Law." I am puzzled at the way it reads, and would like an explanation through the department. The section of the page I refer to reads as follows: "We know that the ordinary 110 volt 16 c. p. incandescent lamp carries approximately a half ampere of current. What is its resistance? We have the formula E ÷ C = R. Substituting figures for letters we have 100 ÷ .5 = R." And now, before I go any further, let me call your attention to the ".5." There are many operators who would not know that .5 means ½. The only way I came to know it was by looking it up in an advanced arithmetic. And now I will finish what I started. 110 ÷ .5 = 220. the number of ohms resistance in the film of a lamp. Now, what I cannot figure out is how you can divide 110 by .5 and get 220. The only way I know is 5 times 110 equals 220. In another place you say: "110 divided by 220 equals .5, or ½." Now, I do not see how you can divide 110 by 220. I do not want you to think that I am criticizing your work in this book. I am a member of Los Angeles Local No. 150. We are doing better now than we have in the past first years, and we thank you for all the good work you are doing for the I. A.

I have given this matter space simply to show what need there is for study on the part of some of our correspondents. Here is a man who undoubtedly means well, but who is hampered in learning the technical part of his business as an operator by the fact that he knows very little about arithmetic. For his benefit let me say that the part of the Hand Book which he quotes is perfectly correct, for 110 ÷ .5 = 220. By way of explanation let me say that, to divide a whole number by a decimal one must add a decimal point and as many cyphers to the whole number as there are decimal points in the divisor, and then divide the same as though both were whole numbers. In this case it means 110.0 ÷ .5, or in effect, 1100 ÷ 5 = 220. On the other hand, to divide 110 by 220 add a decimal point and cyphers to the 110, and then divide by 220 and point off as many decimals in the answer as there are cyphers in the dividend. In this case one cypher gives us a dividend of 110.0. into which 220 goes 5 times, and there being one decimal in the dividend we point off one in the answer, which gives us .5. Any school teacher will show you how to do this. I shall visit Los Angeles after the convention but my stay will be but one day.

Fee in Case of Failure.

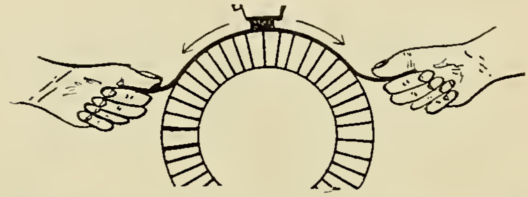
Recently we published an article concerning the proposal of Commissioner Thompson of the Board of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity of New York City, to charge operators a fee of $2.50 for examination, and $2.50 additional in case they pass successfully. As I said in that article, I seriously objected to the proposition of charging a man a fee for the privilege of earning his daily bread—which is about what the thing amounts to. In all seriousness, I would respectfully suggest to the Commissioner the following: (a) That a fee of $5.00 be charged for examination, but that following: (a) That a fee of $5 be charged for examination, but that be refunded. This would place the burden on the incompetent, and tend to eliminate the examination of incompetents because, if the applicant had to put up $5.00 for examination, knowing that that sum would be forfeited in case of his failure to make good, he would be pretty certain that he could make good before applying for examination. The point, as I see it, lies right here: The present burden on the department lies almost wholly in the enormous number of applications made by those unable to pass; in other words, by incompetents. Such an action as I propose would very largely relieve the department of this burden, and, at the same time, work no hardship on the competent man who is able to make good. The trouble with the Commissioner's proposed plan is that it places a direct tax of $5.00 on competent men and lets the incompetent off for half that sum, which doesn't seem exactly right to me.

Motor Lubrication.

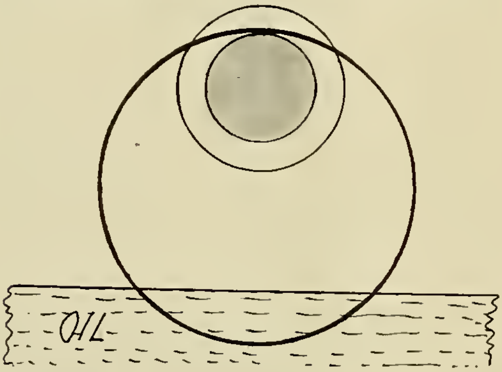
Mr. John Corbin, St. Louis, Missouri, writes:

> Will you kindly explain the best method of fitting new brushes to the commutator of motor-generator sets; also explain how the bearings are lubricated? These may seem like rather elementary questions, but the motor-generator proposition is new to me and I would rather ask a fool question than take a chance and go wrong.

You are perfectly correct, friend Corbin. It is better to ask and get wise than to remain in ignorance, or acquire expensive knowledge through the slow school of experience. Like everything else, there is a right and a wrong way to bed the brushes to a commutator. As a rule the brush arm of a motor generator is fitted with two brush holders and, this being the case, put in the new brushes on one side only, and, using No. 1 sandpaper, a little wider than the brush, with the sand side next to the brush of course, draw it back and forth until the brush has been ground down to fit the surface of the commutator. In performing this operation all dust produced should be carefully blown out by means of a hand bellows, and, by the way, let me here pause to remark that there should always be a good sized hand bellows available where a motor or generator of any kind is used, and every day it should be used freely in blowing the accumulated dust and dirt from around the pole pieces, armature and other inaccessible parts. The method of bedding the brush is clearly shown in the accompanying diagram.



As to the method of lubrication, most motors and dynamo bearings have an oil well below the bearing, the oil being carried up by means of a ring, as per illustration. In the illustration the dotted lines represent the oil. The solid shaded part is the end of the armature shaft, surrounded by its bearing. The large circle represents the oil ring. This ring rests in a slot in the bearing, and directly on the top of the shaft, with which it rotates. Its lower surface passes through the oil which it elevates to the bearing, thus forming a practically perfect method of lubrication. I think the illustrations make the whole matter perfectly clear.



Operators' Duties.

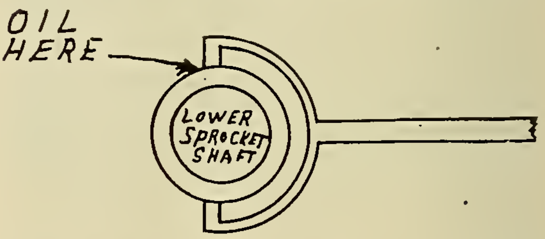
A number of managers have written in during the past asking what I consider as coming within the scope of the duty of the operator. I have been called upon to settle a good many disputes of this kind between manager and operator, though in almost each case the letter was accompanied with a request that I say nothing about their particular case in print. I think it would be well to set forth this matter, somewhat at length, in the department. In the first place the operator may be called upon to do a great many things, if he has time, provided he be paid therefore. But managers should remember that when they employ a man as operator, his whole and entire duty lies inside the four walls of the operating room, except as hereafter set forth. The operators' duties consist in keeping the appliances inside the operating room in good condition, making such necessary repairs as can be done without the aid of a machine shop, and projecting the picture, including the re-winding of the film. To this, however, may be properly added the handling of the stereoticon or dissolver, and the spit light, when it is located inside the operating room, and the care of the motor generator set, if there be one. This is all the operator can justly be called upon to do.

If, however, the manager wants the operator to get the reels and return them, either from the exchange or the express office, well and good; but understand that as this is not any part of the operator's duty. Therefore, let the manager pay the operator a fair and reasonable sum for this extra work. If the operator can write signs and the manager wants him to, all right, but let the manager pay him for it. In fact the manager and the operator can come to an agreement on anything the operator has time to do, even to the sweeping out of the theater, or blacking the manager's shoes, provided the operator is willing to perform the service and the manager is willing to pay for it. It is, however, an imposition amounting to an outrage for a manager to employ a man as operator and then, without any added remuneration, expect him to lug reels to the express office or exchange, write signs, or do anything else outside of duties of the job for which he has been employed. One manager whom I took to task for compelling his operator to carry reels to the exchange and spend three or four hours a day "getting the show" said: "Yes, that is all right, but, although the boss employed me as manager, I am expected to write bulletins, paste up posters and do other things." I told him that that had nothing to do with the operator carrying the reels. If he was foolish enough to take the job as manager and then be reduced to a sort of glorified janitor, why that was up to him. The whole thing sums up in the fact that there are too many managers who want to get every blessed thing they can out of a man, regardless of whether their demands are right or wrong, and, as a rule, this type of manager wants to squeeze the salary of the operator down to the lowest possible limit.

That Chirp.

Canada submits the following:

> I have never visited your department before, but nevertheless have gained much valuable information from its pages. I noticed in the June 14th issue, that A. J. Moran, Grand Forks, N. D., has trouble with a chirping sound in his Powers 6A. I had the same thing, but finally succeeded in locating it in the loop setter. If Brother Moran's machine is equipped with this device he may find the trouble there. It may be overcome (mine was), by a few drops of oil in the groove where the loop setter attaches to the lower sprocket shaft, as indicated in the sketch. I wish the department all kinds of good luck. I will ask that you do not use my name or address.



Brother Moran will please take notice, as well as the other Chirpee who complained of the same trouble. What in the world is Canada so bashful about? He himself has a good looking name, and the name of his town looks like that of a pretty girl, so wherefore all the modesty?

Organizations Benefited.

In a letter from International President Shay, the following paragraph appears:

> I want to take this opportunity to say to you that I have received many letters from operators throughout the country, particularly in the smaller states, stating that they saw the article in the Projection Department and wanted further particulars. I have in each case sent the fullest data and I believe it is paving the way for the methodical organizing of the country next season. You have my kindest regards and heartiest well wishes.

But for the fact that Brother Shay's address was inadvertently omitted from the article in question (being supplied three or four weeks later, however), President Shay would have undoubtedly received a great many more letters than he did. However I am glad to know that the results were satisfactory and trust the hopes of Brother Shay will be fully realized.

"THE DREAM FAIRY" (Edison), July 16.—A story of sentiment giving many extremely beautiful sets and scenes. It will, perhaps, be popular, but not because the people truly believe in it or think its inner meaning probable; but rather because the players, and more especially the little girl (Leonie Flugarth) to whom the dream fairy (Gertrude McCoy) gives three wishes, persuades us by sincerity in acting that they thoroughly believe it. The value of such offerings is that they make the spectator who accepts them better than himself, for the time. Its sentiment crystallizes around the friendship between the two crippled children, a rich girl who has everything, including a doctor able to cure her, and a newsboy (Yale Boss) who has nothing. The newsboy's mother, Mrs. C. J. Williams, helps a good deal. The fairy queen, Gertrude McCoy, is lovely in a perfect double exposure scene. The photography is very good throughout.

"THE SNOWY EGRET AND ITS EXTERMINATION (Patheplay), July 16.—A beautiful picture and a stinging indictment of egret hat trimmings. We have already noticed it at length, see page 184, issue of July 12, 1913.

"THE FIGHT AT GRIZZLY GULCH" (Kalem), July 16.—A two-part special—Indian stories have lessened in popularity in some sections, chiefly because of lack of good acting in them. We have had a full supply and most of them have had absolutely no acting or imaginative treatment at all. An important role in this picture is taken by Jane Wolfe, as a woman whose husband (Carlyle Blackwell) has left the settlement, about to be beleagured by the reds, in hope of getting help. The attack comes and Miss Wolfe makes the dread and fear of it doubly effective by strongly imaginative work. The situation, which has a good measure of freshness, calls for her rescue by an Indian girl whom her husband had helped, and the suspense, fear and weariness of the flight she also makes real. The incident of her hiding on the burial platform of an Indian grave was freshly conceived and very convincing, as was more than one other happening in the story. Jane Wolfe's playing makes her the picture's center of interest; but she is very well supported by the Indian maid, whose name we do not know; by Carlyle Blackwell, and by the whole cast which shows excellent team work. The photography is also of good quality. This will be a good offering in almost every locality.

"A THIEF IN THE NIGHT" (Kalem), July 16.—The good photography is one of the first things to be noticed in this offering; one little series of scenes is a marvel. The picture is a comedy made on an old-time tragedy situation. The opening makes us expect the old story, but our attention is engaged as soon as we see the new way in which it is developed. It won laughter from a part of the audience on account of the acting of Tom Moore, the thief, and of John G. Sparks, the constable. The weakness of the whole comes from the fact that these are the only ones whose roles are not tragic. Alice Joyce plays the wife of a sick man, Stephen Burdee, who will die if excited. Richard Burdon plays the doctor.

"THE MASTER PAINTER" (Vitagraph), July 16.—An artistically made picture that is not strongly dramatic; for it has several situations and the author seems not enough interested in any one of them, although there is a most worthy and deeply poignant state of affairs when the Master Painter (Sidney Drew) is trying to paint his last great masterpiece and failing, though he doesn't know it, for his protege (Courtenay Foote) is touching it up behind his back. The love story between the pupil and the niece (Rosemary Theby) seems a not very convincing or important part of the whole. The picture is well acted and beautifully staged and, with many high merits, will make a good offering. It is clearly photographed. The author is Russell E. Smith and it was produced by Rogers Lytton.

"THE GREAT RAYMOND" (Essanay), July 16.—It gives us a clear view of the clever prestidigitator's performance. One will, if he chooses, notice that the camera has been stopped and see that he is looking at trick photography, not at legerdemain.

"FANCY FOWLS" (Selig), July 16.—Swans, ducks, chickens, a white turkey, etc.; they are clearly photographed.

"SWEENEY'S DREAM" (Selig), July 16.—On the same reel is this continuation of the Sweeney series in which the genial Irish hod-carrier (John Lancaster) dreams that he is nominated and elected mayor of Bordertown. There is a good deal of spontaneous fun in it as, for instance, when his portly wife (Lillian Leighton) has her plush liveried footman bring the family cow up to the back door of the mayor's pillared mansion and does the milking. Clearly photographed.

"THE SWEAT BOX" (Biograph), July 17.—A rough-and-tumble farce that got a good deal of laughter out of the audience. The fun begins in earnest when Isadore takes the steam cure in the doctor's sweat box.

"A CHINESE PUZZLE" (Biograph), July 17.—Even more laughter greeted this farce than the other on the same reel. The sweetheart of the girl (Grace Lewis) gets a job with the family in the guise of a Chinese cook. It is a lively picture. Both parts are pretty well photographed.

"THE WILES OF CUPID" (Lubin), July 17.—There is an appeal in this offering that may make it very acceptable to many spectators and there is also some very beautiful photography. The story is weak and not new and gives little chance for sincere acting. Vivian Prescott, who plays the girl, might have heightened the effect by dressing more simply for the part which should have been made very ingenuous. Jack Standing plays opposite to her, with John Smiley as her father, and John Ince as the rich man. It was produced by L. B. Carleton from Lawrence McCloskey's script.

"EASY MONEY" (Patheplay), July 17.—A lively farce with a number of fresh and astonishing situations that kept the house laughing. It is clearly photographed, acted with a sense of the humorous, and makes a good offering.

"HUBBY'S TOOTHACHE" (Vitagraph), July 17.—The audience laughed a good deal over this picture, which is a very fair Bunnyfinch, short but funny all through. Wilfrid North produced it from a script of Freeland Clark.

"SANDY AND SHORTY" (Vitagraph), July 17.—On the same reel and also a farce, but by the Western company. It made more laughter than the former, but of these split comedies, the second is, of course, apt to seem the funnier. Major McGuire and Charles Bennett open it as two next-door grocers in a quarrel. One employs George Stanley; the other, Robert Thornby (two friendly tramps) to throw boxes over a fence into the neighbor's yard. The fence is too high to let the tramps see who is throwing the boxes back. Robert Thornby produced it from W. Fanson Durham's script. Both are clearly photographed.

"THE POISONED DARTS" (Melies), July 17.—As an offering of entertainment to the public, this split reel is, by all odds, the best among to-day's releases. The first part tells a slight story of romantic adventure on the wild, jungle-grown shores of southeast Asia. It is fresh and of great interest, because it has been made truly convincing. One feels not only entertained but instructed by such a picture, and we commend it highly for all sorts of occasions where substantial offerings are wanted; for it is substantial, though the story is slight. The photography of the jungle and its people is clear and often beautiful.

"A CHINESE FUNERAL" (Melies), July 17.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this remarkably instructive picture. We didn't think, from its title, that it would amount to much and were agreeably surprised. It is very well photographed, and there is an astonishing amount of matter in it. A very good offering.

"PUT TO THE TEST" (Selig), July 17.—A real melodrama. It is made according to the old formula and, at first, is tiresome, in spite of beautiful photography and its very pretty scenes; but the end makes up by furnishing a little heart-warming comedy. The ending probably gets its humor from the producer or from the fact that the players began to enjoy their roles when they got to the so melodramatic happly ending The country girl is found singing in a church by the great vocal instructor and taken to the city. There are far too many singing scenes and some in the audience were inclined to guy them; but, at the end, there was a first class laugh. From the scene in which Winnifred Greenwood finds that, with the baby in her arms, she can sing again, the story "gets over." Hardee Kirkwood produced it.

"THE HEART OF A GAMBLER" (Essanay), July 17.—A rather commonplace story, and the picture, though clearly photographed and fairly acted, lacks backgrounds and even atmosphere.

"THE SECRET FORMULA" (Patheplay), July 18.—In these two reels will be found a fine picture; in the second part it attains to the dignity of a big picture. There are scenes in which there is a genuine thrill. The jump from the back of a horse to the platform of a moving train, the fight on the rear platform, the fall of the two men and the roll down the embankment are so realistically done that the interest is held in unusual manner. Also there is a fox hunt, in which at the beginning of the pursuit the animal is shown close up; the hunted, frightened look in the eyes betokens the reality of the scene to the quarry. In taking the rail fences there is one mishap close under the camera. There is an excellent cast; the photography is clear; the story is logical; the interiors are lavish and the outside scenes picturesque. "The Secret Formula" will make a hit wherever shown.

"EVERY THIEF LEAVES A CLUE" (Essanay), July 18.—This picture is well done. It is a story of detective work, which is clearly indicated. There is one defect, however, which mars. The man assigned to find a burglar gets his first clue from his wife, who by a remarkable coincidence enters a laundry just in time to see a man bring in a torn garment, the rent of which corresponds to a piece of cloth which her husband later shows her. The information brought to the detective by his wife leads straight to the culprit. Armed with this basic clue, the securing of the cumulative evidence is done in logical fashion.

"JIU JITSU" (Patheplay), July 18.—A part reel of unusual interest, showing many tricks in handling and disarming men. The demonstration is by two Japanese, who are remarkably proficient.

"BEAUTIFUL CATALONIA" (Patheplay), July 18.—On the same reel is this excellently photographed scenic, containing interesting pictures of rural Spain, including some ancient bridges.

"THE YELLOW STREAK" (Vitagraph), July 18.—A picture that is unpleasant; it is not good entertainment. It is not often in real life that a man, speculatively bent, is when on the verge of or already ruined handed by his sister $10,000 with which to buy her a ranch. It is assumed that "thru" is intended for "through." The picture is well made and well acted, the burglarious husband who is mistakenly shot by his wife being played by Alexander Gaden. There is a good Stock Exchange scene.

"TO ABBEVILLE COURTHOUSE" (Edison), July 18.—This picture, which was photographed in Georgia, will interest on account of the locality, or rather on account of the backgrounds, because there is nothing in the film to indicate where it was taken. The action is slow, the story itself does not arouse interest.

"WHAT THE DOCTOR ORDERED" (Kalem), July 18.—Very thin comedy. There are one or two laughs, the kind that seemed to be automatically bestowed on a stout person.

"THE CONCRETE INDUSTRY" (Kalem), July 18.—A short picture on the same reel as the foregoing. One of the views is of 76,000 tons of rock being dislodged by a blast of fourteen tons of dynamite; another is of a cement plant with a capacity of 40,000 barrels a day. It will interest.

"GRANNY'S OLD ARMCHAIR" (Selig), July 18.—A story of a grandmother, who in order to show her gratitude to a grandchild bestows on him by will her old armchair. It is only later, when the chair is damaged by reason of a fire in the house, that the child discovers projecting from the upholstery of the piece of furniture a note indicating that there is a fortune inside. Which it will be conceded is rather a risky way to leave money or valuables. But perhaps Granny knew that sooner or later the house containing the chair would burn and the chair be scorched just enough to reveal without destroying the note.

"A MORO FISH DRIVE AT JOLO" (Selig), July 18.—On the same reel is this short but rather interesting bit photographed in the Philippines.

"THE ROSE OF SHARON" (Essanay), July 22.—A picture containing sentiment and pretty scenes. The story is of a man who becomes an officer in the Northern army who is in love with the daughter of a Southern officer. Before the Northerner goes away he writes a note to the girl asking her, if she feels for him affection, if she will the following day wear a rose. He calls on the girl; the two kiss most affectionately. The man when the girl is out of the room puts the note inside the girl's handbag; she does not find it. Twenty years later she receives a note that the man is coming to town and wishes to see her. The message begins: "Dearest Althea"—although presumably the writer has not seen her in the twenty years. Althea arrays herself in the garb of the old days, even taking out of the trunk the handbag, which she places on the piano. Of course the caller finds the note where he had placed it and all ends happily. It is possible the young man had no right to construe the demonstrative kiss as an indication of the girl's affection; but even if this was insufficient to endow him with courage to ask Altbea point blank he might have put the note where it would be certain to reach her.

"A GREAT METROPOLITAN NEWSPAPER" (Edison), July 22.—A picture that will interest those unfamiliar with the making of a newspaper. To the initiated there will be regret that the attempt was restricted to the mechanical department and completely ignored the gathering and writing of the news and tracing of its course to the printer.

"THE BENEFACTOR" (Lubin), July 22.—Arthur Johnson here porlaughs as the worm turns and the whip falls into his hand. Bradley a wealthy man, turns out of his house his son and bride—he does not like the girl. Gedney has made arrangements to endow a library. The son and wife, in poverty, are helped by the Socialist, who rooms next to them. The Socialist finds on the stoop of Gedney's mansion a suit of the owner's clothes containing money. He places them in the room of his neighbors. The son finds his father's name in the coat and believes the suit and the money were sent by his father. He goes to thank him. Approaching the house he is arrested. Taken back to his home, accompanied by his father and the detective, the Socialist hears the argument and enters the room; he declares that he took the clothes. When the father asks the Socialist if he knew the man to whom he gave the clothes was his son he replies, "No, but your actions and your idle wealth are a discredit to you." Gedney comes to a realization of his shortcomings and forgives everybody. The situation will not appeal to thoughtful persons. It is not logical; it is forced. The telegram received by Gedney signed "Gedney & Co." indicated he was no idler. No Socialist will be inclined to accept the story. The antis should welcome it. The picture is well acted and staged.

"THE PICKPOCKET" (Vitagraph), July 22.—Flora Finch does fine work in this suffragette comedy. Her excursions into feminine politics leaves husband Bunny in the lurch. There will be many hearty laughs as the worm turns and the whip falls into his hand. Bradley Vandawater writes the script and George D. Baker produces it.

"THE SENORITA'S REPENTANCE" (Selig), July 22.—A story of the desert and of the ordinary sort.

"IN AND AROUND SCUTARI AFTER ITS CAPTURE" (Patheplay), July 22.—A picture showing the horrors of war. There are views of battered buildings and fortifications, of abandoned guns and ammuntion. The scene of the refugees leaving the town after the capitulation is real drama—the side of conflict not thought of when one views the pomp and glory. It is a rare film.

"IN WEIRD CRIMEA" (Patheplay), July 22.—On the same reel is this unusually interesting scenic. One of the most striking views is of a dead village, inhabited three thousands years ago. It is on the side of a great cliff. There is another village of caves which will hold interest sharply.

"THE NE'ER TO RETURN ROAD" (Selig), July 19.—This story by Mrs. Otis Skinner will hold throughout. Contributing to this result will be the story itself; also the direction, the acting and the photography. What stands out, however, is the work of Lillian Hayward. Her part might well have been written for her. There is splendid support. The excellence of the photography in a couple of the interiors was responsible for showing up indifferent scene painting. The reason given by the mother to her husband for the aiding of the escaped prisoner who was also the murderer of their son, was to "forgive trespasses," etc. It is possible a more human touch would have been given to the scene and a far more reasonable one, had the mother said to the father: "Would you not have done the same as this man, had your happiness been assailed by another as this man's was by our son?" This, however, is immaterial. The two reels are worthy of high praise; there is a grip at the end which many may find uncomfortable, especially where the picture is fortified by such music as the writer heard here at the Savoy Theater.

"JIM'S REWARD" (Lubin), July 19.—A Western melodrama that is not at all artistic; but this is no great drawback, for the spectators to whom this kind of offering appeals most strongly are not very critical, so long as the story gives them thrill and excitement. It will also make an appeal to many, because of its human situations, though these are not strongly acted at all times and are more or less artificially arrived at. It is by Wilbert Melville. The photography is clear and good.

"DURING THE ROUND-UP" (Biograph), July 19.—The discharged Mexican gets his friend (Henry Walthall) to apply for the place left vacant on the ranch. It is just at round-up time when it is easy to rob the house and get off with money. The daughter (one of the Gish girls) of the owner is loved by the foreman who, at first, is jealous of the stranger. After the robbery, the girl jumps into the wagon and, hidden, is carried away by the thieves to be rescued by the foreman, galloping after. The object is to provide a sensational rescue—the foreman catches her safely from the wagon after the villains have been disposed of and does it from horseback at speed. There are interesting backgrounds and some fine views of a big herd of horses. It is pretty well photographed.

"THE SMUGGLER" (Kalem), July 19.—A picture with many scenes on shipboard and that has, for its chief interest, a duel of wits between a crafty woman smuggler (Alice Hollister) and a detective. The man is deceived and suspects not the maid, but the mistress, who is entirely innocent and ignorant of the real character of her servant. To end the picture, after the smugglers have been brought to justice, with a love story is, of course, conventional; many people seem to like such an ending. It is not a convincing picture and, therefore, does not affect us deeply. The photography is only fair.

"RIVER LIFE IN HONG KONG, CHINA" (Vitagraph), July 19.—Some pictures of junks; it is very interesting and clearly photographed. There are only a few feet of it.

"THE TAMING OF BETTY" (Vitagraph), July 19.—It is asking a good deal of a producer to require him to visit a new country, so different from ours as China, and put out in the new backgrounds a melodrama that will be convincing and human. This offering has plenty of novelty, but, as a story, it isn't effective. Betty (Clara Kimball Young), asked to marry the son of her mother's old friend (William V. Raoous) goes out into the Chinese city, where her mother is living, to help her missionary friend. Her brother (James Young) to cure her, makes up, very well indeed, as a Chink and scares her. She does not recognize him; is frightened; is rescued by the young man (Maurice Costello) whom her mother wants her to marry and we have a happy ending. The photography is clear. The author is Eugene Mullin and the producer Maurice Costello.

"THE FRIENDLESS INDIAN" (Patheplay), July 19.—In this situation there is a noticeable punch; in this development it is not quite so strong. The friendless Indian is refused a home by his kin and, though he has rescued a white man's little girl, is also refused a seat at the white man's fire. The punch comes from the fact that the settler refuses him in a country where hostile reds are plentiful. These attack and, in the skirmish, the settler's mule runs away with the child in the wagon and the friendless Indian once more rescues her, just before the runaway mule, trying to negotiate a steep bank downward, falls so that the wagon runs over him. The ending scene doesn't really belong to the story; it is a wonderful sunset picture—truly a marvelous photograph.

"BARCELONA, THE LARGEST SEAPORT IN SPAIN" (Patheplay), July 19.—On the same reel is this series of not very clear views of an old and interesting town.

"A TARDY RECOGNITION" (Edison), July 21.—On a day when there are no very strong offerings among the regular releases, this seems to be the best. Its theme is old and it makes some difference, even though it is acted and produced fairly well. There are three unnecessarily crude moments in it—when it is to be shown that the old father is being neglected, a newspaper is snatched out of his hands. He is seated at the table and his daughter doesn't like to see the paper and, like many other wives and daughters, in pictures, snatches it. Her refusing to pour the coffee a bit later changed from the character who would snatch the paper; it would have been better to have had the old man want to pour for himself and have had her make a fuss. Then the emotion natural to the climax was lost by the leading woman's turning back to her husband when she has recognized her father whom she has not seen for years and lost track of. That tourist's hat didn't pass at once for a park workman's hat. The story is human and fairly believable. The characters are, for the most part, natural and the photography of the interior is clear. The author is Charles M. Seay.

"THE SHORTSTOP'S DOUBLE" (Selig), July 21.—No one will be likely to believe that a kodak fiend would be permitted to take snapshots of strangers drinking in a cafe. It is done in this picture and one cannot say that any of the picture is strongly convincing; but it does tell a story in which either one character plays two parts in absolute perfection, so far as illusion goes, or two men appear who look so much alike that no one can distinguish them. This is likely to interest. The photography is clear. The script, by Arthur Hankins, was produced by Charles H. France.

"THE ACTOR'S STRATEGY" (Lubin), July 21.—A Western melodrama by Wilbert Melville. That these pictures have a wide appeal is sure and this offering seems a bit better than usual for pictures of this kind. The story is quite clear; is straightforward and not overambitious; the players do their parts well, and the photography is commendable. Those are good scenes in which Sanchez watches Pedro kill the prospector who has just "struck" gold. The climax, in which the actor, now working for the rich Pedro, makes him think he is seeing the prospector's ghost and confess, is also effective. A very fair offering.

"THE ONLY WAY" (Vitagraph), July 21.—The plot of this offering is unusually weak for Vitagraph pictures. The author, Edward McWade, has given nothing that has not been shown before except the climax and his expedient in building this is marvelously artificial.

"A BOLT FROM THE SKY" (Kalem), July 21.—A shooting star kills the heroine's father after the butler has overheard him refuse the daughter's hand to the hero and things snarl up so that the hero is accused of murder. There is no sincerity in the making of this picture. How could there be? It has a happy ending; there is some good photography, and pretty scenes. Alice Joyce and Tom Moore have the romantic leads.

"TAPPED WIRES" (Essanay), July 21.—This offering, a special in two parts, has been reviewed at length in this paper—see page 186, issue of July 12, 1913.

"PA SAYS" (Biograph), July 21.—A farce of exaggerated characters that is undeniably laughable, though vulgar, in parts, to a degree. Pa says, "Theodore is a Lizzie-Nizzy" and won't let him marry Kate, so Teddy does a female impersonation act. It made a good deal of laughter.

"WHILE THE COUNT GOES BATHING" (Biograph), July 21.—On the same reel, this farce has somewhat less vulgarity and is less laughable. It lacks the snap that we cannot deny the other has.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 34" (July 21.)—A view of the Terra Nova, Captain Scott's ship, is shown entering the harbor of Cardiff, Wales, and there is a glimpse of the military funeral of Lieutenant Call, the army aviator who recently lost his life while on duty in his aeroplane. Among other items, the views of the sailing canoes in the recent race at Bath Beach, N. Y., will be liked; there are a couple of lively moments shown, for the wind was brisk.

"ON THE BROAD STAIRWAY" (Edison), July 19.—This very good detective story, by J. Searle Dawley, is the second in the "Kate Kirby Cases" and makes what probably is the best regular release of the last two weeks. The situation at the opening is finely dramatic and it gets a tremendous impetus from the early development of the plot. At the start, we find Bigelow Cooper and Bessie Learn about to be married. Bigelow has discovered that Bessie's older sister, May Abbie, is the one whom he really loves. She returns his love; but won't hear of his breaking Bessie's heart and insists on his going on with the ceremony. She has been interrupted while writing a note to him to this effect, and has slipped it down beside a settle. A few moments later the bride-to-be is found dead on the broad stairway. When the detectives come, it is found that Bigelow's knife killed her, and when May's unfinished note is also found, it looks as though he had murdered her. May does not know that he is innocent, nor does the spectator. One of the detectives is a woman, Laura Sawyer, and when the inspector, Robert Brower, tries to wring the truth out of May, her sympathies are so worked up that she goes out to make further investigations, believing they will clear May and Bigelow. This we think the picture's most brilliant scene; but the whole of it is very clever. The acting, photography and direction are all worthy of the best commendation.

Independent

"THE HIGHER JUSTICE" (Reliance), July 26.—A two-part story by Forrest Halsey which develops a very interesting situation in the second reel, where the rich man's son by the girl he wronged prosecutes his own half-brother. The first reel tells the story of the father's betrayal of the girl when he was a college student, and his later marriage to a society girl. We do not think either the world or society at large would condone the sort of villainy he was guilty of, as the sub-titles indicate, and the girl would have had plenty of legal redress when she discovered the marriage was a hoax. The story, however, compels interest and makes a strong release.

"THE LITTLE PIRATE" (Reliance), August 2.—A simple story, by George Hennessy, in which Bobby and his grandfather go to sleep in a boat and are carried out by the tide. They land on a reef, which presently becomes submerged in water. The old man sacrifices his own safety to let the boy float away on a heavy piece of timber, but in the end both are rescued. A natural episode, well pictured.

"A WAR TIME MOTHER'S SACRIFICE" (Broncho), July 30.—A strong two-reel war story, leading off with an interesting situation where the spies trick the colonel's son into believing he has committed murder at a card game. Later they force information out of him regarding the Confederate plans. The son flees to his home and commits suicide. The mother, desiring it to be known that he died a hero, takes the body to the battlefield and places the colors in her dead son's hands. The battle scenes are vivid and contain numerous fresh situations. A commendable war release.

"THE PIT AND THE PENDULUM" (Solax).—A special offering in three reels that will excite enthusiasm. The story is from the tale of Edgar Allan Poe dealing with terror and horror and creating an atmosphere around the spectator that is likely to make him shiver. We were indeed astonished at the effectiveness with which the fearful tortures of the story's hero have been illustrated by the Solax producer. The sets are remarkably realistic and this is especially true of the dungeon-filled monastery, into which the luckless hero is dragged and in which, before he is released, he is tortured with fiendish ingenuity. The quiet occupants of many of the dungeons shown are skeletons and all the mechanism of torture, including the cell with the pit in its floor, down which we see skulls and crawling serpents (this bottom of the pit is not so realistic as it might have been) have been extremely well conceived. The pendulum, massive and sharp, which swings back and forth and ever draws nearer to the bound victim, is also effective, as is the manner of his salvation from it. Rats gnaw the ropes that bind him. Finally, we feel the walls around him growing hot and see them folding in on him.

We have been watching the monks peering down at the man they are trying to destroy, their faces lighted by baleful fires, and we have noticed that the heroine has found help in a company of soldiers whom she is bringing to the rescue. Thus is created a telling element of dramatic suspense and it gives the picture "punch." The plot is strongly constructed. Darwin Karr has the central role and is at his best. The picture depends very much on his work and he rises to the occasion well, is imaginative and clear cut. He surely deserves credit. The others supported him fairly well; but there was little real evil strength in the monks; Fraunie Fronholz, the villain, is not at his best in such a role. The heroine (Blanche Cornwall) did good work. The photography is excellent.

"THE GREATER CALL" (Eclair), July 23.—A three-reel film telling a strong story of the Northwest. Certain situations suggest the well-known play, "The Great Divide," where the girl in the cabin faces two men alone. She says she will give herself to one of them if he saves her from the other. The duel scene which follows is well handled and all that follows holds the interest powerfully. Barbara Tennant plays the part of the girl and Messrs. Johnston and Lund are the two outcasts who have been expelled from the mining camp for cheating at cards. The two eventually find happiness after their return to civilization. A good release.

"THE FRONTIER TWINS' HEROISM" (Frontier), July 24.—Some rather entertaining fun on a ranch, with the twin girls as the leading participants. The twins are refused permission to go on a picnic and are forced to retire early. The latter part of the reel is devoted to portraying an exciting dream with which one of the girls was visited. Good photography helps the story along.

"ROSITA'S CROSS OF GOLD" (Reliance), July 30.—A film story carrying a strong East Side atmosphere, with characteristic views of the sweatshop, tenement houses, etc. The girl's cross and chain are stolen and her lover accused of murder; but the situation clears in the end and he is found to be innocent. True to type from a pictorial standpoint and capably acted.

"BELOW THE DEADLINE" (Reliance), July 28.—There is so much plot in this story, and its scenes move so rapidly that it loses a certain degree of strength as a result. Rosie is a girl crook, whom Joe, the newspaper reporter, discovers in the act of stealing a diamond necklace from Mrs. Vanderbilt. He returns the necklace and declares his love for the girl. Later he is suspected of having killed her father, but the crime is eventually fastened upon the absinthe drinker, where it belongs. Plenty of plot in this, but it lacks the convincing quality in numerous scenes.

"JUST KIDS" (Keystone), July 28.—Quite an amusing story, worked out by child actors until toward the close. The boys are rivals for the little girl and fight over her. Later her doll gets into the pond and the sailor boy proves himself a hero by rescuing it. A pleasing comedy.

"MISSION BELLS" (American), July 31.—The young atheist, impersonated by Warren Kerrigan, buys a home near a mission church. He loves a young girl, but she will not accept him until he is converted, which is brought about by a serious accident in the hills. Jack Richardson appears as a monk and assists in the conversion. An effective picture, nicely photographed and full of attractive scenic settings.

"WHEN DARKNESS CAME" (Thanhouser), July 22.—A pretty story without any particular strength, but with a good love interest in it. The girl loses her eyesight temporarily and is forgotten by all of the firm and its employees except one clerk, who secretly loves her. He pays the cost of her treatment and in the end marries her. The story is attractively developed, but comes to a rather abrupt close.

"THE TOP OF NEW YORK" (Thanhouser), July 25.—A love story with a distinctly novel setting. The girl works in a lower New York skyscraper and her lover is a lieutenant on Governors Island. She learns the army signal service and when she is locked out on the roof Saturday night only her frantic appeals to her distant lover save her. Close views of New York skyscrapers and Governors Island are shown. A novel offering.

"THE PAJAMA PARADE" (Majestic), July 20.—A series of college pranks are about all that make up this little comedy. The boys dress up in their pajamas and visit the girls' dormitory, where the latter are indulging in boxing matches. The girls throw water on the boys and Tom and Betty are suspended. Later they marry. A conventional comedy of college life, well pictured.

"THE MIGHTY HUNTER" (Majestic), July 22.—An amusing film, in which the heavy-set young fellow who likes to tell big hunting stories is chased by a live bear. This picture works out well, though the bear does not look very savage. Some good laughs scattered through this reel.

"HIS WAY OF WINNING HER" (Majestic), July 19.—Fred Mace appears here in a good character part. He hires out as a governess to the girl he loves and thus marries her in spite of her father's objections. A good, clean comedy half-reel.

"GOLD CREEK MINING" (Majestic), July 19.—This, on same reel with above, is another successful offering, with Mace in the leading role. He forms a plan to unload some worthless mining stock on two business men. Later he reads that the stock has taken a boom and recovers it, only to find the report was an error. A very good number.

"SINGLE-HANDED JIM" (American), August 2.—An interesting variation of the stage hold-up plot. Jim, in love with the sheriff's daughter, bets that he can hold up the stage single-handed. He puts white markings on his horse and then washes them off. His plan succeeds and his rival takes a hand at the game in order to discredit Jim. The story is very entertaining and nicely photographed.

"I SHOULD WORRY" (Ramo), July 30.—One character in this picture will add nothing to the pleasure of many who see it. He portrays an impossible sissy. Much is made of an automobile pursuit in which a father with a gouty foot tries to overtake an eloping couple and prevent a marriage. The picture will make a fair release.

"THE POWER OF HEREDITY" (Rex), July 31.—An interesting film story with Robert Leonard and Marguerita Fisher in the leading roles. The girl, adopted from a family low in the social scale, proceeds to fall in love with the handsome butler. He turns out to be a hero and quite worthy of her. The part of the father was overdone, particularly in the matter of makeup, and the closing scene, while perhaps characteristic, was a drawback to the picture. As a whole the offering is successful.

"THE TOLL OF THE DESERT" (Frontier), July 26.—The best thing in this picture is some marvelous views of the sandy desert; they are unlike anything we remember seeing before. The leading man, on whom the burden of the plot falls, is not powerfully convincing in this particular role, and the story, lacking vigor, doesn't move us deeply.

"THE THIRD THIEF" (Eclair), July 27.—On the same reel is this little love story by the French company. It is beautifully hand colored and has been carefully made with an eye to artistic scenes and so is a pleasing offering. Its heroine is a pretty flower girl much sought after by the gallants of the town, young officers and others; but by two in particular. The third thief is the one who steals her love. The costumes are of the eighteenth century.

"WHAT PAPA GOT" (Crystal), August 3.—A clever farce; it has a good deal of freshness, is briskly acted and will go well. Pearl White and Chester Barnett play two lovers; but the girl's papa doesn't like the youth. The picture's best comes from the players, who are very sure of the themselves in work of this nature. Pearl is especially good in the amateur theatrical scene, and there is no scene in it that is not cleverly acted and commendable.

"HIS LITTLE DARLING" (Crystal), August 3.—On the same reel with the foregoing, but it hasn't the same bright quality. The two, however, will go together very well. It seems really to exist for the sake of the joke with which it ends, a very good joke, too. As a final, the "little darling" tells her stepfather's new wife that she is her stepdaughter and her mother too. Little darling's papa had not told his new wife about the little girl—she must have weighed two hundred and fifty. There are a good number of laughs in it.

"IN AFTER YEARS" (Victor), August 1.—A love story written by Bennet Musson and produced by James Kirkwood. It deals with an orphan, Gertrude Robinson, sent to the one-time sweetheart of her mother, who years before, had run away and made a very unhappy marriage. The opening scene is made most effective by good acting on the part of all concerned. Then, while the girl is on her way, the elderly lover dreams her mother's love story for us and Gertrude Robinson plays the leading role in this, as her mother in her youth, and, after she reaches her new home, has a happy love story of her own. It is her pretty ways that give the offering its best charm; but the backgrounds and sets are very well chosen, all the players do commendably, and the photography is fair. It is a pleasing offering.

"THE PAPER DOLL" (Crystal), July 29.—An entertaining full reel story, with a dramatic close. The note written on a letter, afterward cut into a paper doll by the little girl, saves the hero from conviction as a murderer. A unique situation, well led up to, and worked out to the best advantage. A good offering.

"LORD BARRY'S LOW ACQUAINTANCE" (Imp), July 31.—This picture has quality and tone. It presents a fine social satire in the guise of a simple story. The pampered, petted dog sleeps in a bed and has perfume baths. The boy sleeps in an alley and leads a veritable "dog's life." The dog is lost and the boy befriends it, spending his last penny to buy it food. In the end both boy and dog find a happy home. The idea in this picture and its capable acting raise it far above the average in heart interest and general appeal. A fine offering.

"BANZAI" (Kay-Bee), August 1.—A two-reel offering, with the first scenes laid in Tokio and the second in America. The Japanese setting is very attractive and native characters appear in certain parts. The American lives with a Jap girl, Mirami, but leaves her to return to America. She follows him, dressed as a boy, and with an accomplice steals valuable papers from him. He shoots her, but the papers are burned by her companion. The story is by W. H. Clifford and is quite a successful offering.

"GET RICH QUICK" (Keystone), July 24.—The robbers take a stolen safe to an island and the powder house gets on fire. They are pursued by citizens and the police force. There is plenty of comic action in this, but the idea around which it centers is not very strong.

"THE CAVE DWELLERS" (Bison), August 2.—This offering is fascinating on account of its subject and, strongly handled from an artistic viewpoint, it stands out above the ordinary releases in interest. The story is a love tale of cave men and is simple, straightforward and clear. It is also poetic and has a quality very much like authentic folk-lore. The players are neutral in their work and seem to attain the impression they desire with perfect ease, and this makes the picture very vivid. It is a desirable offering.

"WHILE THE CHILDREN SLEPT" (Powers), July 30.—Here is an interesting children's picture; it will amuse women and children and probably many of the men. There is a bit of comedy toward the finish that will entertain all.

"THE STRANGER" (Imp), July 28.—A two-part offering, with King Baggot in the leading role. It tells a Kentucky mountain story with suggestions of "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine," but with a different development. There is a clearly worked out plot and it holds well, especially in the more romantic second part after King Baggot, the disappointed millionaire who has come to the mountains, meets June (Violet Mercereau). The climax follows an exciting attack of moonshiners upon him, and this the producer has handled with originality and speedily; it is exciting. One of the first things noticeable in the picture is the freshness of the camera work and the interesting, unhackneyed angle from which the scenes were taken. The photography is not perfect in all the exteriors, but is fair. An acceptable feature.

"IT IS HARD TO PLEASE HIM" (Eclair), July 13.—One of the series of novelty pictures drawn by the Eclair cartoonist.

"A CATHOLIC MISSION" (Eclair), July 13.—On the same reel is this finely tinted and interesting picture showing many Chinese children. The close-camera views of the little ones are of unusual interest.

"HIS FRIEND THE UNDERTAKER" (Nestor), August 1.—A smallpox sign farce that will make laughter. There is some freshness in its situations and it has lively action. Mr. Newlywed, whose wife is in the country, fears that his parents-in-law are coming to make a visit and steals a smallpox sign to tack on his doorstep. When he finds himself and the friends who are celebrating with him quarantined he sends for his "friend the undertaker" to help him get away in a box. The homecoming of the wife ludicrously spoils this scheme. It is an offering that has been made and acted in good farcical spirit and will amuse.

"TRAPPED IN THE DEATH PIT" (Union Features).

This thrilling Union Feature dramatization of a series of intensely gripping incidents reaches the pinnacle of realism in a sensational scene at the botton of the sea. Much of the action takes place in the blazing hold of an ocean liner, where human lives hang in the balance.

When a famous Parisian banker sent a consignment of bullion to South America, Marx, a notorious thief, being aware of the shipping of the treasure, embarked as storekeeper. Before the liner left the dock, the banker, his wife and her maid visit the ship.

Marx had already removed one crate of bullion and thrown it overboard, having arranged with a diver to recover it later. As he was about to throw another cask over, he was surprised by one of the ship's officers. In the chase that followed, a quantity of high explosives were set off by the blazing lantern the thief carried.

Trapped in the Death Pit.

Scene from "Trapped In the Death Pit" (Union Features.)

The first that followed gained ground with frightful rapidity. When the hold was a seething furnace, it was discovered that the banker's wife and her maid were imprisioned therein. Sailor after sailor descended into this raging pit in a vain endeavor to rescue the entrapped women, but had to give up on account of the smoke and flame. Finally, Lafarge, the sweetheart of Suzette, the maid to the banker's wife, succeeded in reaching the seemingly doomed girls, just in the nick of time.

When order was restored, the Captain found that one of the crates of bullion was missing. He immediately came to the conclusion that it must have been thrown overboard. The diver was sent down to investigate, and, sure enough, the cask was found at the bottom of the sea. When it was brought up by the diver, he surprised all by descending again and returning with the dead body of Marx, the thief. His own greed brought about his death and the mystery of the robbery stood clear.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"A COUNTRY COUSIN" (Great Northern).

In this subject the Great Northern has prepared another one of its enjoyable comedies which fairly exhales merriment from the outset. The invasion of a seminary for young ladies by a chap whose sister is a student in the institution forms the main theme and it is carried out without the slightest breach of the proprieties. It is a matter of romping fun and the predicament of the stern female principal of the seminary, after she has become aware of the fact that "a male person" has entered the sacred precincts.

Jack is a jolly sort and while the young ladies of the seminary are enjoying their afternoon walk, he makes a wager that he will be able to enter the temple of learning and make himself agreeable. He assumes the role of a country cousin to his sister and when clad in feminine attire invites everyone out to guide him about the summer resort. The principal is the chaperone and all goes well until Jack, in his clumsiness reveals the fact that he is wearing trousers under the skirt which had been provided for him. In order to make his escape he cries "mouse" and a veritable panic follows. During the excitement he makes his escape and rejoins his friends in order to recount the adventures which have made him the winner of the wager.

Scene from "A Country Cousin" (Gt, Northern).

There are several splendid scenes in the comedy and the playlet is presented in excellent fashion.

CO-OPERATION IS THE THING.

While theatrical interests have wasted a lot of time discussing ways and means to fight the intruder, motion pictures, the latter has been quick to see that discussion is foolish and fighting is foolish and the better way is cooperation. One motion picture man in particular has this idea strong. He is Fred Mace, of New Majestic, out in Los Angeles, where is the Orpheum, a big-time theater. Whenever Mace wants a type, or types, that his own forces cannot supply, he drops over to the Orpheum and sees the show. Usually in the course of the show he finds the article he seeks. This was how he came to use Howard and Lawrence in "One Round O'Brien Comes Back." Recently, the New Majestic scenario department gave Mace a story entitled "The School Kids' Picnic," which called for a crowd of bright youngsters. Mace dropped over to the Orpheum show that night, found the headline act "Gus Edwards' Kids," sent for them from the studio next day, and sure enough procured their services. Co-operation is, indeed, the thing where film and theatrical interests are concerned!

"THE GREATER LOVE" (Itala).

Sacrifice at all points of the "eternal triangle" is the leading note of "The Greater Love," as expressed photographically by the Itala Company. The nobility of abnegation is displayed by the doctor-wooer who valiantly strives to save his rival's life after the rival has interposed his body before a poacher's shotgun to save an uncle from death; but the girl, although she loves the doctor, is so moved by compassion for the sorely wounded suitor that she renounces her own love and tells him that if he gets well, she will marry him. Of course this contrary-to-nature act is not suffered to go into operation—the wounded man learns that the girl loves the doctor and accordingly pulls off the bandages—then death.

Scene from "The Greater Love" (Itala).

It's a bully scene where the poacher on the estate is chased through the water and woodland. He goes splashing through the shallows, the horses of his pursuers coming furiously after. There's more than a bit of a thrill in the ambush scene, although the offending gun is not seen in actual work, and the reefs of censorship have been adroitly avoided.

Some good acting is done by the girl who after promising to marry the unloved suitor realizes what a step she has taken and is torn between conflicting emotions—fears that he will recover to claim her and that he won't recover, thereby bringing sorrow to those she loves.

The big scene is when the wounded man, his life hanging by a shred, accidentally looks through the door of his chamber of pain and sees his well beloved in the embrace of the doctor, to whom she is telling her soul-sickening vow. Not to be outdone in that love "for which a man would lay down his life for his friend," the man in the bed tears with fingers of despair the bloody bandages from his shot riddled breast.

"THE MONG-FU TONG" (George Kleine).

Not often will the theater offer more thrilling, more generally satisfying film than that represented by "The Mong-Fu Tong," the Kleine-Eclipse release for Tuesday, August 12.

The subject is characterized by splendid acting, a plot of absorbing interest and many spectacular incidents. The central thought of the story centers about a Chinese band of thieves lead by a crafty Oriental named Mong-Fu. The opening picture is a bid for attention in itself, with a man stretched across his office floor dead. "Arizona Bill," a Westerner stranded in Europe, agrees to run down the murderer and takes up a vigil in the office. That night the carpet is pushed aside, an opening appears and a giant cobra creeps silently toward him.

Scene from "The Mong-Fu Tong" (Kleine).

From that time on there is a constant succession of adventures. In his pursuit of the gang, Arizona Bill makes a daring leap from one automobile to another. His capture is a sensational bit of acting and the tortures to which he is subjected by Mong-Fu, when in the latter's den, is a splendid dramatic touch. How his wife was decoyed into the rendevouz, her thrilling knife duel with Mong-Fu, her daring rescue of her husband and the incineration of the bandits, makes a combination of adventure that constantly suggests the writing of Poe.

Everyone will like "The Mong-Fu Tong." The charming story is backed by fine photography, the situations natural and convincing and the story enthralling.

ON FEATURE ASSIGNMENT DAY.

Now that it is getting to be a day of features, the Thanhouser studio is keeping abreast of the demand and turning out more of the multiple reelers than ever before. The other day, at New Rochelle, was "Feature Assignment Day" and it meant a lot of joy amongst the players who were picked for the feature subjects, as a photoplayer doesn't feel like a regular photoplayer any more unless he serves in the big subjects. In the feature assignment, this is what happened:

Two were for Maude Fealy, "Little Dorrit" and "Moths."

James Cruze was given the male lead in this subject.

William Russell was named for "The Missing Witness," an extra-reel, extra-thrill affair. An important witness fails to show up until a stirring trial nears its ending, and this is the story that William got mixed up in. Of course, at the precise moment, there wasn't a feature for all-the-leads, but President Hite was kind enough to say that every lead who wasn't picked for a multiple reeler just then would surely be well placed on the next "feature assignment day."

HIGH FINE IN ZION CITY.

The City Council of Zion City, Ill., Dowie's old town, has passed an ordinance levying a fine of $200 for showing moving pictures in the sacred town.

"A DASH FOR LIBERTY" (Lubin).

This is a fascinating female detective story and, though extremely dramatic, will compel a roar of laughter at its most intense situation. The little girl is extremely feminine, but accomplishes a piece of work that is worthy of the bravest of men. The story is melodramatic and employs an exciting railroad chase with some few daring leaps from trains going at express speed. "The Little Pinkerton" not only completes her job, but wins the admiration of a bank president, who cannot resist the temptation to kiss the most heroic little girl he has ever met, and whom he intends never to lose. The picture is a two reel special and staged at the Lubin Silver City, New Mexico, studio.

John Field, head bookkeeper of the First National Bank, leading a fast life appropriates not only the bank funds, but also robs the safety deposit boxes. The irregularities are discovered by an old German customer, who has a safe deposit box. The president engages the services of Mary Ryan, a female detective, she quickly ropes the impressionable young bookkeeper and he proposes that they elope. She agrees and they prepare to leave. Mary informs the president and he engages two plain clothes men to make the capture. At the depot, Field, feeling that he is fatched, seizes an engine that is side tracked and bolts. Mary Ryan, the president and the plain clothes men follow and catch up with the defaulter, who jumping from the engine is stunned. Mary also jumps and locking one handcuff on the man she locks the other to her own wrist and then faints. When Field is captured the detective artlessly says that she guesses she fainted, but she got her man.

PRAISE FOR "THE MYSTERIES OF PARIS."

K. W. Linn, manager of the Eclectic Film Company, is in receipt of a flattering letter from Herman J. Brown, of the Famous Feature Film Company of Seattle, Wash., in which a high compliment is paid to "The Mysteries of Paris," Mr. Brown writes:

"Received and ran off your 'Mysteries of Paris,' and am writing this as an appreciation of that splendid film. I wish to say, that this is the greatest dramatic subject I have ever seen. I was held spellbound by its wonderful plot and superb action. It is great; one of the three or four truly good Film Masterpieces.

"To my hundreds of friends and acquaintances in the show business, I wish to say, that they cannot make a mistake in buying territory for this fine picture. There are so many poor productions that are being foisted on state right buyers, that it affords me great pleasure to go on record as to the merits of this Real Feature."

Hurst, for material and labor furnished to Rogers for the erection of an airdome on a lot owned by Hargrave & Hurst. The total indebtedness is $599. The case will not be heard until November, and will not interfere with the business of Hurst, who figures only as the lessee. Hurst has added vaudeville to his picture program at the Gem Airdome.

The insane hospitals of Illinois used moving pictures exclusively in the entertainment of their inmates, and officials of the State Board of Charities say that they have a psychological value in the improvement of their mental condition.

It is announced that only the cleanest pictures will be run.

The city council of Urbana has passed an ordinance making the license fee for moving picture shows $50 a year. It was intended to tax the legitimate houses $10 a year and photoplay houses $75, but this schedule was reduced.

It will seat 600 persons. For the ventilating system two-horsepower fans will force air from the rear of the theater, down through ducts that pass under the aisles. A ten-cent admission is secured for three-reel performances.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

IN THE NORTHWEST.

THE Garland Motion Picture Company was forbidden to give its show in Brown's Opera House at Perry, Mich., because the place is on the second floor. The inspection of houses in Michigan by the state fire marshal is becoming more rigid. Reports from Lansing were that out of 63 inspections but twelve licenses were granted. Fire Marshal Wolfe recently was at Holland, where two houses were ordered to make important changes. There are about 385 picture houses in the state and the inspection must be made so that all can obtain licenses by August 15.

The City Commission of North Yakima, Wash., has appointed a Board of Censorship for moving picture and vaudeville houses. It consists of Rev. Alfred Lockwood, rector of St. Michael's Episcopal church; A. A. Davis, city superintendent of schools; Fred Schaefer, moving picture theater proprietor; Mrs. W. L. Lemon, of the Woman's Club, and Miss Marie Lindgren, general secretary of the Young Woman's Christian Association. Pictures will be investigated after complaints have been filed with the mayor. The appointment grew out of objections filed to crime and violence scenes.

Three picture houses in Butte, Mont., the Orpheum, Ansonia and American theaters, have raised their prices to fifteen cents from 6 to 11 o'clock in the evening. The matinee prices will be five cents for children, and ten cents for adults. Box seats will be twenty-five cents.

Petitions signed by members of the various churches in Fenton, Mich., were filed with the Common Council asking that moving picture theaters be closed on Sunday evenings. The council cited the recent case of a Lansing photoplay manager whose house was closed on Sunday by the council, and who won a victory when the Supreme Court decided the council had no right to do so. The Fenton council refused to order the closing.

Films of the National Turnfest at Denver, Colo., were made by B. F. Strackmann, cameraman for the Pathe Weekly. The United States Motion Picture Company, of Denver, also took some pictures that were sent to the Animated Weekly.

The World's Best Photoplay Production Company is reported to be contemplating making a summer location near Trinidad, Colo. There are many good settings there and metropolitan street scenes could be taken when necessary. A. Maxwell Toffler, president; Clarence Rhorbaugh and Walter Gahle, scenario editor, were recent visitors to Trinidad.

Solomon and David Newberg have sold the Lyric moving picture theater at Crookston, Minn., to Simmons & Snyder.

J. V. Bryson, of Minneapolis, Minn., has issued a circular to exhibitors in the Northwest that his company will release a Northwestern service, to be known as the Gopher Review, which will feature

Minneapolis and other Northwestern pictures. The first poster announces views of Minnehaha Falls, St. Anthony Falls, Longfellow Gardens, the North High School fire, the Memorial Day parade, the baby show and the big flouring mills. The latter are Minneapolis pictures.

C. D. Adams is now manager of the Gem Theater at Owantonna, Minn.

The East Side High School in Minneapolis has purchased a moving picture machine, to be used in teaching chemistry, physics, botany and physiology.

It is reported the moving picture operators of Racine, Wis., will affiliate with the Trades and Labor Council of that city.

Eugene Levy, of Seattle, Wash., president and managing director of the Eugene Levy Greater Amusement Enterprises, controlling the Melbourne and Circuit theaters, and Grand Opera House in Seattle, and theaters in Tacoma, Spokane, Portland and other coast cities, has returned from a three-weeks' trip to California, made in company with Harry R. Rand, Western representative of the Mutual Film Company. The purpose was to book new feature pictures and to look at several productions that had not been released.

Helson & Maher have opened a picture show at Atwater, Minn.

The lower house of the Wisconsin Legislature refused to concur in the bill that gave the Wisconsin Industrial Commission the right to regulate moving picture shows. The bill was passed by the Senate, but owing to the action of the lower house, it died a natural death.

G. Rosenbaum is said to contemplate erecting a $75,000 moving picture theater at Grand Rapids, Mich.

A resolution to create a "Standing Room Only" sign ordinance in Seattle was opposed by managers of the photoplay theaters. The proposed ordinance provided that when all the seats are taken and fifteen people are standing in the foyer, the sign shall be displayed. The managers contended that a change of the entire audience is necessary every eighty minutes, and this would be impossible, if they had to depend on the outside crowds coming in at one time.

The North American Motion Picture Company had a couple of cameramen near Ogden, Utah, taking pictures of the "Railroad Over the Sea" on the Ogden-Lucien cut-off.

C. A. Marshall, proprietor of the Lyceum Theater, at Duluth, Minn., contemplates erecting a new theater near Fifth avenue, West, which will be used for traveling attractions and leave the Lyceum for photoplays.

Leach & Taylor, of Perry Mich., have notified the state fire marshal's department that they will close their moving picture theater, as they are unable to comply with a rule of the department that all chairs must be fastened to the floor. The hall is used occasionally for dancing, and rather than discontinue these events, the photoplays have been eliminated. The fire marshal's department has asked the attorney-general for an opinion as to whether it will be possible to require carnival companies and other tent shows operating moving picture machines to provide stationary chairs. The fire marshal contends that many accidents in picture shows are due to the fact that chairs are not securely fastened. If this rule applies to tent shows most of them will be put out of business.

Des Moines, Iowa, is assured of two new moving picture houses and the construction of two more is proposed. O. P. Herrick is erecting a new photoplay house in Highland Park, and J. Miloslowsky is remodeling the building at 607-9 Locust street, to be used for the Palace Theater. It will cost him $25,000. C. Christey has been negotiating for two sites in the downtown district to be turned into photoplay houses.

Walter A. Gardner, of Chicago, field secretary of the National Indoor Games Association, has been at Marshalltown, Ia., investigating the different branches of indoor sports. In all the cities the moving pictures were viewed with a view to ascertaining whether pictures are being shown which might prove harmful to the young.

Moving picture men of Independence, Kansas, filed a petition with the city council asking that they be allowed to operate their theaters on Sunday. However, when the photoplay men saw a delegation of church people file in the city council chamber, they withdrew the petition, declaring they did not wish to antagonize members of the various churches.

J. F. Swain has sold the Alamo Theater at New London, Iowa, to E. W. Livingston, of Wayland, Iowa.

The Toledo Hippodrome Company, of Toledo, Ohio, has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $10,000, to conduct moving picture shows. The incorporators are Jasper R. Ford, Ray Sawtelle, Benjamin F. Key, Walter G. Kirkbride and M. L. True.

Dr. England is opening a moving picture show in the Spear Building, at St. Bernice, Ind.

LOUISVILLE.

THE Walnut Theater, Louisville, will shortly open as a moving picture theater, according to a recent announcement. The Gus Sun Theatrical Company, of Cincinnati, is the power behind the project, it is said. Twenty-five and fifty cents will be the fees, and the way in which this announcement is received by the Louisville public will be watched with a good deal of interest by exhibitors and others interested in the business. It is the plan of the Sun people to show only high class feature films, running from five to seven reels in length. This also is an innovation in Louisville. Whether the public prefers the lengthy subjects to the short single reels has been a subject of discussion among exhibitors for some time, and the reception accorded the Walnut policy will be noted carefully. Women as ushers, cashiers, ticket-takers and other employees will be a feature, and about the only man around the theater will be the manager. The attaches will be attired in natty uniforms.

The Avenue Theater, which has been a moving picture house for some time past, has been turned over to the lessors by Morton Shaw, who has held the lease and operated the photoplay house. The old theater is to be converted into a five and ten-cent store, according to an announcement recently made.

Moving pictures are to be made of the 1913 convention of the National Paint, Oil and Varnish Association, according to an announcement by its officers. The meeting is to be held in Minneapolis the latter part of September.

"Quo Vadis," the coming of which has been eagerly awaited by the Louisville public, is to be shown at B. F. Keith's Louisville house some time in August, according to Manager James Weed.

"The White-Gloved Band," a Gaumont production, has been one of the best of the week in Louisville.

The new Hippodrome Theater, on which work has begun at Lexington, Ky., will be a combined vaudeville and moving picture house, it has been announced by L. H. Ramsey, head of the operating company. Ten, twenty and thirty cents will be the admission prices. It is likely that Kinemacolor will be shown, either constituting the moving picture section of the act, or being put on in addition to the black and white pictures. September 8 has been set as the opening date for the theater. The house will be 60 by 130 feet in size, and will contain a balcony, in addition to the main floor and the numerous box seats. A seating capacity of 1,000 will be available.

The Arcade Theater, of Paducah, Ky., recently staged a baby contest that aroused high interest in the Western Kentucky city. All white babies were eligible for a small admission fee, which paid only for the film used in making the motion pictures of the babies. The parents were allowed to retain the film on which their baby appeared, following the contest. The judges saw only the film, and the prizes were awarded from the pictures, instead of from the originals, as is usually the case. The parents and friends of the contestants turned out en masse for the unique contest, and the film was fully as attractive as any others shown in Paducah for some time.

The management of Bluegrass Park, near Lexington, Ky., has decided to make the pleasure resort as attractive as possible and accordingly has installed an airdome.

Clarence Meisburg and Edwards Vivion are the new owners of the Melba Theater, of Harrisburg, Ky. J. Hal Grimes, the former proprietor, will give his attention to other business interests. The new managers will enlarge the theater and beautify it in various ways, according to plans.

The Elkhorn Amusement Company has been formed at Lexington, Ky., with a capitalization of $500 to operate moving picture theaters and other amusements. C. L. Williamson, R. J. Wade and S. P. Beard are the incorporators and chief stockholders of the new company.

The National Moving Picture Company, of Louisville, has announced that negotiations are practically concluded whereby the corporation will take over a Fourth Street location and erect a house with a seating capacity of 2,000. Work will begin as soon as the present occupant vacates. The exact location of the site has not been disclosed, officers of the Company fearing complications by a premature announcement.

With trading stamps of all kinds enjoying a popularity in Louisville amounting to almost a craze, David Levinson, manager of the Novelty Theater, has taken up stamps, using them two days a week. Wednesdays and Fridays have been designated as the afternoons on which stamps will be given to lady patrons. A dollar's worth, or ten of the stickers, will be given with each ten-cent admission ticket.

The Sycamore airdome went out of existence a week after birth, finding business in the residential section rather slim. A. C. Winston was the owner of the airdome, which was located at Third and A Streets. Mr. Winston has left Louisville, intending to enter the business elsewhere.

The old Avenue has closed for once and all, unsentimental contractors being busily engaged in converting the old amusement house into a five and ten-cent store. The Avenue is Louisville's oldest show house, with the possible exception of Macauley's Theater. During the past year the Avenue has been a moving picture theater, and has raked in the shekels more briskly than for some time in that role. The passing of the theater caused general regret.

The Star Theater, of Elizabethtown, Ky., has established a novel precedent by closing down for the month of July. Should August continue unpleasantly hot, the theater may also be closed for that month. Many of Elizabethtown's residents left for the summer early in July, and the management decided to suspend operations for a time for that reason. This plan will hardly meet with favor in larger cities, however, where expenses are heavier and business is not so greatly affected by the exodus of vacationists.

Campbellsville, Ky., is to have a moving picture theater shortly. That town was overlooked for a long time by exhibitors, but citizens have decided to enter the business themselves. J. R. Strother, S. D. Ward and Raymond Hamilton have leased quarters and will open in a few days.

Contracts have been awarded for work on the new Hippodrome Theater, of Lexington, Ky., and the actual construction work will be begun as soon as the excavation is completed. L. H. Ramsey, who will have the management of the theater, hopes to have it completed in time for the Bluegrass Fair which takes place in Lexington early in September. The Hippodrome will have a seating capacity of 1,000. The house will cost $25,000.

J. A. Needham, owner of the Lyric Theater, of Pineville, Ky., has sold that house to John Leman. Mr. Needham will retire from the amusement field for a time. The policy of the Lyric, of showing only moving pictures, will be maintained by Mr. Leman, who is a newcomer in the field.

The new Princess Theater opened at Mayfield, Ky., recently, under the management of William E. Grau. An automatic orchestrion is a feature of the theater, giving the effect of a full orchestra. The Princess was erected for a moving picture theater, being one of the few houses in the smaller cities of Kentucky which is especially adapted to the business. Mr. Grau established the Band and Rex Theaters at Hopkinsville, Ky., both of which made successes.

J. P. Masters, of Bowling Green, Ky., recently abandoned the bachelor life he had been leading, wedding Miss Willie Rector, also of Bowling Green. Mr. Masters operates both the Columbia and Elite theaters in Bowling Green, and has the reputation of being one of the cleverest exhibitors in the business. He is probably the only exhibitor in Kentucky who issues weekly programs, covering attractions in both houses for the next week. The couple left on a short honeymoon following the ceremony and will be at home to friends in Bowling Green late in July.

With a capitalization of $20,000, the Lexington, Ky., Theaters Company has been incorporated. W. S. Herndon, Frank Christian, and L. A. Ramsey are interested in the new company, which will operate a string of moving picture houses, according to plans.

A transformation that excited much interest was that announced by N. A. Michelson, of Cincinnati, Ohio. Mr. Michelson has arranged to convert a former undertaking establishment on West Sixth Street into a moving picture theater. Architects are at work on the plans for a house with a seating capacity of 1,000. Mr. Michelson recently purchased the property for $12,500.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

BUFFALO.

VILLAGE President Fred. W. Case, of Fredonia, N. Y., has been instructed by the board of trustees of that place to proceed no further in regard to enforcing the moving picture ordinance recently adopted by the trustees, which prohibited exhibiting moving pictures on Sunday, under penalty of $25 fine for each offense. The members have been advised by an attorney that it is doubtful whether the law can be enforced.

Manager A. R. Sherry, of the New Lyric Theater, Buffalo, which features moving pictures and vaudeville, recently furnished several free acts for a benefit performance at the Majestic Theater. The house was donated by Manager John Laughlin. The money went to the families of the thirty or more victims of a recent explosion at the Husted Milling Company's plant, Buffalo.

A recent Canadian report says, in part: "The Methodist Church of the Dominion of Canada has gone into the moving picture business, and hopes eventually to possess a chain of 'theaters' in all principal cities from the Pacific to the Atlantic. Many prominent citizens of Vancouver have foreseen the good brought about by the exhibition of the missionary department's series of films, with the result that they are desirous of having a permanent picture house in their city, in which they could present their own films, both humorous and educational. The proposition has taken such a firm hold that an option on a site has been obtained, on which it is proposed to erect a $100,000 building, which will also serve for institutional purposes. Should the expectations of the promoters be realized, other buildings of a similar nature will be erected in other centres."

Manager Charles Bowe recently showed at Keith's Columbia Theater, moving pictures of the reunion at Gettysburg. Several Buffalo veterans were represented in the pictures.

The Colonial Theater, of which President Wolff is manager, is located on Main street, Rochester, in the heart of the business section. The house has four first-run films every day. Mr. Wolff was a State delegate to the New York Convention of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America. He was also a member of the advisory board of the exposition. "The theaters of Rochester are showing the best pictures in the country," said Mr. Wolff, "yet there isn't a house here that is charging more than 5 cents admission. Rochester is in a rut so far as low admissions are concerned, but we hope to improve conditions soon."

W. Edward Seybel has been manager of the branch of the General Film Co., at 158 Main street, East Rochester, since February. His appointment came under the new regime of that company. "Our Rochester business has shown a steady increase," said Mr. Seybel, "and our company has more customers than ever before. There are forty-four moving picture houses in Rochester and business is good. This city is a leader so far as first-runs are concerned. The quality of the shows is first class."

The General Film Co. will shortly open a distributing station in Syracuse. The poster departments recently opened in Buffalo, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and New York by this company have proved such a benefit to customers that a similar department will be opened in Rochester. Additional space will be used for that purpose.

In November the Happy Hour moving picture theater will be opened on St. Paul street, Rochester, by Manager Curtis. The house will have a capacity of 3,000.

An airdome, with a capacity of 3,000, has been opened in the central business district of Rochester.

The largest type of Wurlitzer organ has been installed in Fitzhugh Hall, a moving picture theater on South Fitzhugh street, Rochester, and is proving a great attraction. Charles Sherwood is manager of this house.

The Lincoln moving picture theater, 700 Jay street, Rochester, has been improved by the addition of a large balcony. Harry Wick, manager of this house, is well known among moving picture men in that city. Hundreds of children are included among the patrons of his theater. Mr. Wick is noted for continually introducing novelties at his house. Not long ago when he presented "Alkali Ike's Home Coming," he wanted to add realism to the part of the scene showing the hero welcomed by the village musicians. Mr. Wick hired a band for the occasion at a considerable expense. When the picture of the band serenading "Alkali Ike" appeared, the real band, concealed behind the curtain, struck up a lively air, and Mr. Wick found his spectators aroused to great enthusiasm.

The demand by the Rochester people for its shows, has warranted Gordon's moving picture theater, the largest in that city, to remain open during the summer months.

Riel's Film Follies is the name of a moving picture show given in a tent at Sea Breeze, N. Y.

Pictures of the Elk's parade and other features of the B. P. O. E. convention, were taken in Rochester recently by the Yale Feature Film Co.

Manager W. A. Callahan, of the Hippodrome moving picture theater, Rochester, recently used his presence of mind to advantage. It was during the Elks' automobile parade in that city. Addressing his patrons, he stated that the house would be closed till after the parade. The theater, which was packed, was emptied in a short time, and before the fire apparatus arrived, for a blaze in the hallway on the third floor of the Liberty Building, in which the Hippodrome is located. The fire did not prove serious.

The Rudolph Wurlitzer Manufacturing Co., of Martinsville, near Buffalo, was recently inspected by a large party of moving picture men of the United States and Canada.

Moving pictures and vaudeville will be featured at the Lafayette Theater, Buffalo, which was bought recently by Morris Slotkin and Jacob Rosing, for about $250,000. The house will be ready for these programmes about January 1st, after extensive improvements are made.

Moving pictures and vaudeville are being featured at the Rustic Theater, at Olcott Beach, a few miles from Buffalo. This is the first season for moving pictures at the Rustic, and on account of being in the open air the moving picture part of the programme will be given evenings only.

Free moving pictures are shown every evening in the airdome at Carnival Court, a popular amusement resort in Buffalo.

A recent report from Toronto, Ont., says: "That moving picture shows are an asset to a business district, because they centralize business in the retail stores, was an argument which secured for Frederick Burgess a reduction of $50 a foot in assessment on his property at 36 Langley avenue, Toronto, from the Court of Revision here recently."

BILLY BISON.

NEW ENGLAND AND CANADA.

CHARLES HARPOOT, owner and manager of the Jewell Theater, Lowell, Mass., finds business very good. In fact, trade is really too brisk, and on this account, Mr. Harpoot has purchased land on the corner of Tremont and Merrimack Streets, upon which he is building a theater that is to be thoroughly modern, fireproof and up-to-the-minute in every way. The new house will have a seating capacity of about 1,200 on the ground floor, as no balcony is being built. Mr. Harpoot's plans call for a lobby that will be 27 feet wide and 50 feet deep. The old Jewell Theater will be closed when the new Jewell opens to the public, which should be by Labor Day, provided no unforeseen delays hold things up. Mr. Harpoot has a prominent location for his theater, just opposite his old house, and feels that he will retain his former trade and add to it. The Jewell will open as a moving picture and illustrated song house; no vaudeville will be offered. Mutual service has already been contracted for from the Boston offices of that corporation. Mr. Harpoot knows his business, and knows the conditions of the trade in Lowell, and should have no difficulty in making good on his new venture which will cost him $40,000, or very near to that figure.

The Gem Theater, Peaks Island, near Portland, Me., has decided to change its policy of musical comedy attractions, which policy has been in vogue for several seasons. The Gem is now offering a good quality of Mutual service and seems to be thriving on it. The house is a very popular one and does a real capacity business during the vacation season.

Manager Charles H. Davenport reports that his new house at Houlton, Me., is now nearly ready and hopes to open it next week. Mr. Davenport's house should do well with its photoplay programs, as from all accounts, it is the best theater in Houlton.

The Universal Film Exchange of New England, has moved its booking and shipping departments into the new Walker-Gordon Building, 1106 Boylston Street, Boston. This is the same building in which the Mutual Film Corporation is located. The Back Bay, Boston's fine residential district is now a real moving picture center, due to the fire laws, which make it difficult for a film exchange to secure satisfactory headquarters in the downtown section.

Moxley Blumenberg, president of the Maine State Branch of the Exhibitors' League, reports that his branch is bound to be a live-wire organization with a steadily increasing membership. To this end, Mr. Blumenberg has sent to each exhibitor in his state, who is not yet a member of the league, a letter, requesting every non-member to immediately make application for membership. Mr. Blumenberg declares that the Maine branch is going to total 100 members in the very near future and everyone who knows the latter's methods, is sure to believe the statement. Mr. Blumenberg is greatly interested in the progress of his organization and will leave no stone unturned to "put it across." The Casco Theater is proof of Mr. Blumenberg's ability to make good, as this house is a prosperous photoplay house, run on high standard basis. Every Maine exhibitor should see that he joins this branch! Get busy boys, it's for your own benefit!

The large delegation of Maine exhibitors that attended the big New York Convention, all swear they had the time of their lives, to say nothing of learning much of practical use to them, in a business way. You must hand it to the Maine bunch—they arrived with much eclat! Mr. Hiram Abrams, National vice-president of the League, piled his large automobile with the Maine delegates, who had one fine joy-ride from Portland to New York.

Mr. N. Menasse, manager of the Empress Theater, Edmonton, Alta, reports excellent business at his beautiful theater. The Empress has been open since the first of last December and created much interest as being one of the finest theaters in all Canada, built expressly for the exploitation of photoplays. Mr. Menasse has a seating capacity of nearly 900, and the house cost well over $100,000. There are about twelve theaters of importance in Edmonton, all showing photoplays, and the Empress is known as the queen of them all.

The "Quo Vadis?" pictures stay on at the Tremont Theater, Boston, without any loss of interest, even though the weather is very warm. Many Boston people who have seen these reels claim them to be the best and most effective products of the art of motion photography. For the four weeks the pictures have been shown at the Tremont Theater, the house has been filled all the time.

The Salem Square Swedish Church property at Worcester, Mass., has been sold to Mr. Thomas A. Gannon. The price paid is said to have been $70,000, and it is reported that this Congregational Church will be converted into a playhouse, or torn down, and a modern vaudeville and moving picture theater erected on the site. The location is a good one for a theater of this kind.

Every one sincerely interested in the advancement of motion pictures will be interested in the following. On July 9, for the first time in any settlement house in Boston, moving pictures were exhibited at the Elizabeth Peabody House, on Charles Street. Though the house had its official opening last March, the first formal business session was not held until this week. The pictures were an added attraction, arranged by Mr. Henry C. Green, and it is planned to repeat these shows at regular intervals throughout the year. The officials of the house plan to hold these entertainments regularly and to charge a purely nominal fee for admission. A unique feature of the Elizabeth Peabody House is the fact that it is the only settlement house in Boston, equipped with a miniature theater. It is believed now that one settlement house has shown the way, others in different sections of Boston will follow suit in the matter of entertainment. However, not all of them have the advantages with which the Peabody House is equipped. The little theater seats 300 people and because of its recent construction, it is wholly fireproof. New programs of pictures will be shown three times each week. Surely this is a great triumph for the photoplay. Not so very long ago, these columns bore witness to the fact that these very settlement houses were saying all kinds of bad (and untrue) things of moving pictures in general. This was due mostly to ignorance, which is now evidently corrected.

Moving picture men ranged their cameras last week on $3,000 worth of burning salmon on the Commonwealth Flats, South Boston, Mass., where the Federal Government was destroying the fish because it was below the pure food law standards. There were 984 cases in all of Alaskan salmon. The burning was done by Deputy U. S. Marshal Bancroft.

This week a statement of payments made to legislative counsel and agents was filed with the Secretary of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. This refers to moneys paid in the interests of bills presented to the "session of legislature just concluded. It cost the Boston Moving Picture Operators' Union $300 to lose their bill providing that no person shall be licensed to run a moving picture machine unless approved by those previously licensed. The full details of this bill, that was finally vetoed by Governor Foss, have appeared in these columns. The money was paid by the Union to William C. Franke, its business agent.

Showmen at Revere Beach, Mass., evidently are having their troubles, and the exhibitors are getting a full share of it. This week, a hearing by the board of Selectmen of the town was held, at which the proprietors of amusement resorts charged that police officers were foisted upon them and that they were forced to agree to most unreasonable demands for free tickets. Mr. Clarence A. Warren, of the Crescent Garden Amusement Company, which operates a large moving picture and vaudeville theater, stated that many people had applied at the theater with cards from Selectman Bruno Hartung. Mr. Warren said that these people had been admitted, but that this proceeding was irregular and unbusinesslike and in the future, these cards would not be honored. Several other photoplay theater owners testified along these same lines and Selectman Bruno Hartung was free to admit that many children came to him, asking for tickets and he stated that he believed they were entitled to have some amusement in theaters which do not pay half what they should for the privilege of doing an immense business. He declared that the theaters could well afford to give the children a chance and that he was in favor of getting them as many free tickets as possible. Mr. Hartung has the virtue of frankness at any rate! However, if the theaters do not pay a large enough license, why not have the amount increased in a lawful way? Just because the houses are doing an "immense business" (which they are not), there can be no reason for forcing the managers to "come across" with passes to satisfy Mr. Hartung's love of the little folks. If the Selectman has the children's interests so much at heart, he should open a theater of his own and run it free to all.

Messrs. Schultz and Green announce that they have acquired the opera house at Stockholm, Maine, which will be operated as a photoplay house, with Mutual film service. This concern is very much alive and has a money maker in the Perry Theater, Presque Isle, Maine.

The Star Theater, Boston, has purchased a Power's Cameragraph, No. 6-A, from the R. D. Marson Moving Picture Company, and Manager Hugh O'Neill reports perfect satisfaction. The star is a firm believer in Power's and always buys that same make of machine.

Mr. J. H. Kimball, representing the Eastern Theaters Company, announces that he has contracted for five reels of Mutual service, with three changes each week, for the Art Theater, Orange, Mass. Mr. Kimball states that this house is doing very well and that Western features and comedies are the most popular with the Art Theater's trade.

From Winnipeg, Man., comes a story to the effect that Mr. Walter Morrison, a millionaire mine owner of that city, has decided to become a vaudeville and moving picture theater magnate and, with this end in view, is about to buy the control of a large number of theaters.

On July 7, Manager Joseph A. McConville, of the New Portland Theater, Portland, Me., inaugurated a summer policy of straight photoplay programs. Kinemacolor service and feature films are to be used, and Mr. McConville is confident that his audiences will like his change of policy.

Mr. E. S. Donnellan is now installed as manager of the Orpheum Theater, Vancouver, Canada, after an absence from that city of over five years. Mr. George F. Case, former manager of the Orpheum, was forced to leave Vancouver in the interests of his health. This house is one of the finest in Vancouver, and offers talking pictures and vaudeville acts, to good business.

The Bijou Theatre, Vancouver, has reopened after a thorough overhauling. This work cost about $25,000, and the Bijou is now a model theatre, giving straight programs of photoplays.

Mr. B. F. Keith, the monarch of vaudeville, gets up against a tough proposition now and then, and the Lynn Theater, Lynn, Mass., proved to be one of them. Mr. Keith has tried for about two years to make this house show a profit, with vaudeville and pictures, but with little or no success. On this ac-

ving Picture Houses

Did you ever stop to consider the evolution of the motion picture and the progress it has made in the amusement business of the world? It has blazed a trail that has no ending. Do you ever think of the millions of capital that is being invested in this gigantic enterprise? Every year in your city magnificent, palatial theatres are being erected, so in short time the smaller picture houses will have to go out of existence, as you cannot compete with the big fellows and afford to pay motion picture trusts the money that they will ask of you shortly. In other words, the smaller picture house will be throttled by the monopolies. What are you going to do about it? There is only one solution to the question.

count the Keith interests have abandoned the Lynn Theater. It is now rumored that Marcus Loew will try his hand at the Lynn Theater, starting August first, with brand of vaudeville and pictures.

Mr. J. J. O'Neil, manager of Lakewood Park, Milford, Conn., states that his summer season is opening up in good shape, and that the moving picture programs are doing their share to make business so good.

Keith's Theater, Pawtucket, R. I., which has been closed for the past two years, is now in the hands of painters. The house will reopen this fall as a photoplay theater, to be known as the Bijou.

The Ontario, Canada, Moving Picture Association is an active organization, trying to make conditions better for the exhibitors in that section. A meeting was held this week in Toronto, at which a good number of exhibitors were present. This league is trying to effect the appointment of a "Dominion moving picture censor board," so that any film shown in one province may be shown in another. At present, each province has a censor. This means that a reel may be "passed" for one province and its exhibition forbidden in another. Which, of course, makes for general confusion and continued trouble.

A new theater, to be devoted to vaudeville and photoplays, is now assured for Paris, Canada, as Mr. A. D. Campbell, of Brantford, Canada, has secured a site on Mechanic Street. The land has a frontage of 60 feet, and is 120 feet in depth. Plans are to be made immediately, and a first class theater is promised, to cost about $35,000.

The Attorney-General of Alberta, Canada, is on the job, and then some! This gentleman has called the owners of the Orpheum, Gem, Portola and Monarch Theaters before him, to answer to the charge of having violated the Sunday law. All of these are moving picture theaters. The preliminary hearings will be held in the police court before Inspector Raven. The writer has been told that nothing serious will come of this, as it is more in the nature of a test case than anything else. When the case is settled, exhibitors in this section will know just what they can do on Sundays, which they do not know, at present.

Mr. Lester Treffrey, connected with the Lyceum, Majestic and Empire Theaters, all of Edmonton, Canada, was married to Miss Marie Farrell, of Portland, Oregon, on June 30.

The Lakeview Theater, at a summer park near Lowell, Mass., is giving free exhibitions of photoplays and illustrated songs as a lure to bring people to the park. A real inducement!

Manager Bob. Janette, of the Globe Theater, Boston, converted from legitimate attractions to vaudeville and picture programs, states that it appears from his experiments that photoplays do not attract more than a fair percentage of patronage to the mixed vaudeville and picture bills displayed at his theater. In fact if you take Mr. Janette's word for it, pictures supply good summer spice to variety entertainment, but that vaudeville should carry the burden of the program in the regular season. It was Mr. Janette's curiosity that brought about a series of experiments at the Globe to determine which branch of the entertainment brought the greater trade to the theater. At that time, as now, he is running a reel of pictures for every act of vaudeville. His first experiment was to increase his vaudeville acts, and to decrease his pictures. The results showed increased business. Then Mr. Janette dropped back to an even division of vaudeville and pictures, and business dropped back with it. He repeated his first experiment, and business showed an increase. This convinced Mr. Janette that vaudeville was carrying the real load, and that the photoplays were really drawing a small percentage of the patronage. These experiments have taught Mr. Janette that a change of policy will be about the proper course to take when the new season opens, and the announcement has been made that a complete vaudeville bill of twelve to fourteen acts will be presented, with no moving pictures, twice daily. Pictures will be retained at the Globe for the shows that run from 10.30 in the morning to 2 p. m., and from 5 p. m. to 7.45 p. m. The regular afternoon and evening shows, however, will be run without pictures. During the hours that the pictures are exhibited, vaudeville will be mixed with the bills. Mr. Janette's experiments need worry no exhibitor as to the attraction and hold the photoplay has on the public. The Globe is a large theater, and is not by any means a photoplay house. The projection has never been up to the mark there, and Mr. Janette's results simply prove that the public insists on vaudeville in a vaudeville house and photoplays in the electric theater. It is to the moving picture theater, built expressly for that purpose, that the public goes for this type of amusement, and not to the large theater that gives pictures as "chasers," projected in any old way, just to kill time.

Both the Grand Opera House and the Nickel Theater, Ottawa, Canada, were burned to the ground by fire which started in the Nickel Theater this week. The loss will amount to about $75,000, but there was no loss of life, as the theaters were empty at the time of the fire. The Grand Opera House was owned by Messrs. Grant and Fleming, and cost $25,000. Mr. J. H. Ferguson owned the Nickel, which cost about $40,000. Both theaters were heavily insured, and will be rebuilt.

Mr. W. Withrow, manager of the Massey Theater, Toronto, Can., sends word that he exhibited the Captain Scott pictures in his house for the last two weeks, to capacity business.

A charter was issued this week to the Somerville Amusement Company, a $5,000 corporation, with Clarence M. Mixer, J. Frank Mixer and Hiram E. Miller as the promoters.

Stealing the other fellow's thunder does not find favor with Chief License Clerk Casey, of Boston, which accounts for the fact that Mr. Casey refused to allow the Comique Theater to run a version of "Quo Vadis?" while the Kleine pictures were showing their three-act version to the very limit, but Mr. Casey killed the exhibition early in the game.

Mr. James W. Degnan, manager of the Franklin Opera House, Nashua, N. H., is now enjoying a well-earned vacation. The Opera House is still open, and expects to do business right through the hot weather, as a good grade of photoplays is attracting good-sized audiences for Mr. Degnan.

On July 13th, a severe electrical storm passed over Bangor, Me., centering several miles below there, over Riverside Park, where about five hundred people were in attendance. The wind ripped the canvas covering over the seats in the open-air theater. The canvas fell on a number of persons, creating a panic and much excitement. Several women fainted, and many suffered from fright.

Mr. D. D. Scullen, manager of the Broadway Theater, Springfield, Mass., was called to New York last week by the death of his father. Mr. Scullen's many friends extended their sympathy.

Mr. P. F. Shea has decided that Robert J. McDonald is the right man to manage his Holyoke, Mass., theater, called the Sheedy. Manager McDonald has already had charge of this house for two seasons, and knows local conditions.

S. Z. Poli's theater, Springfield, Mass., has a regular moving picture staff connected with it, and pictures are taken of any local event of consequence.

Work is now really under way for the new theater being built at Lowell, Mass., on Merrimack Street. This house, when finished, will play to photoplay programs.

Mr. George Case is no longer to be seen in charge of the Orpheum Theater, Vancouver, Canada, a large house, devoted to talking pictures and vaudeville. The condition of Mr. Case's health made it imperative for him to go South. Mr. Edward J. Donnellan has succeeded Mr. Case, and there will be no change in policy. The Orpheum is considered one of the best theaters in Vancouver devoted to moving pictures.

The Panama Theater, Vancouver, Can., is now offering a program of photoplays and illustrated songs, as the former policy in vogue at the house proved a failure.

Mr. K. E. Finlay is the live-wire moving picture man of Ottawa, Canada, operating the Family and Francais Theaters, both of which do a capacity business. As an added attraction at his Francais Theater, Mr. Finlay has just installed an orchestra, in order that both of his theaters should be on an even footing.

Mr. A. E. Cobb, manager of the Princess Theater, at Waterbury, Conn., reports very good trade with his programs of Mutual service and illustrated songs. Mr. Cobb uses no vaudeville, but trade is amply good enough to warrant being open all summer.

On July 12th, Waterbury, Conn., became the proud possessor of a really high-class theater devoted to a straight policy of high-class pictures. The Star Theater, on Baldwin Street, is a most distinct addition to Waterbury. With a seating capacity of a little over one thousand, a mirror screen and every modern improvement, the Star is bound to do a land-office business, especially as Mr. Benjamin Hansdorf, manager of the Alhambra Theater, also owns the new house. The Star is fireproof, and no expense was spared in its construction. The house will not run vaudeville, as Mr. Hansdorf intends to show that a first-quality picture program given in a beautiful theater is all that is required to draw capacity houses.

Mr. Joseph A. McConville, of the New Portland Theater, Portland, Me., is leaving no stone unturned to make his summer policy of moving pictures a success. This week the New Portland featured "Quo Vadis?" "The Blue and the Gray at Gettysburg," and "the Last Days of Pompeii." Surely a representative selection of pictures!

Mr. George Dausteau reports that his Airdome at Woonsocket, R. I., is having a very satisfactory season so far. Moving pictures are offered here.

Mr. H. A. Chenoweth closed his Shawmut Theater, Boston, last Saturday, in order to let the hot weather have a chance! Manager Chenoweth will reopen in a few weeks with his regular policy of vaudeville and pictures. The Shawmut has had a fine season, due to Mr. Chenoweth's ability.

The National Theater, Boston, the largest theater in the country devoted to vaudeville and pictures, has closed for the rest of the summer. It is worth noticing that "The Battle of Gettysburg" reels kept the National Theater open for the last few weeks, after the vaudeville part of the program proved unequal to the task of pulling in the trade. The house will reopen with its regular policy in force.

Mr. H. A. Chenoweth has taken over the theater at the Relay House, Bass Point, Mass., where he will devote his energies for the next few weeks. Under Mr. Chenoweth's guidance it is safe to say that the house will be a winner.

Mr. John F. Royne, formerly press representative of B. F. Keith's National Theater, Boston, and now manager of Keith's Theater, Cincinnati, Ohio, has returned to the Hub to spend his vacation.

Lawler Brothers report that the Kinemacolor pictures they are featuring at their new theater at Greenfield, Mass., are very popular. A good grade of Vaudeville is also on the programs.

Mr. W. A. Weseley, of the theater bearing his name at Greenfield, Mass., has closed his house for the summer, but will reopen early in August.

Edison's talking pictures are being featured at the Park Theater, Taunton, Mass., by Mr. A. A. Kellmann, who finds his summer trade very fair.

His Majesty's Theater, Montreal, Canada, has exhibited the "Quo Vadis?" reels for the past two weeks, and to judge by the steadily increasing business, this feature will have a long run at His Majesty's.

The Rex Theater Company, of Moose Jaw, Sask., is to build a large theater in that city, to be devoted to vaudeville and pictures. A location has been secured, and various concerns are now trying to get the contract for building the house.

The new Milford Opera House, at Milford, Mass., is now completed, and will be open the latter part of August. The new house is modern and fireproof in every respect. It has a seating capacity of well over one thousand, and every modern convenience for the benefit of its patrons has been arranged. The house cost $75,000, or very near this figure. Milford, which is a live manufacturing town, has been without a good theater since the Music Hall was destroyed by fire, almost two years ago. The theater has a population of about 50,000 from which to draw. Manager C. W. Currier has been put in charge of the new house, which will run vaudeville and pictures, and also some road shows.

The Colonial Theater, Pittsfield, Mass., is now closed, and some needful alterations and repairs are going on. The Colonial has had a tough season, but that was merely due to the fact that Pittsfield folks did not care for stock-company attractions. When the Colonial reopens, it will be in charge of Messrs. Worsley and Graves, who have leased this house. A change of policy will be in order, and moving pictures and vaudeville are favored.

It is now rumored that pride will not allow the B. F. Keith interests to abandon the Lynn Theater, Lynn, Mass., which they have tried to make a winner, but with little or no success. The house is now closed, and it was reported that it would not reopen again under the Keith banner. It looks very much as if the Olympic Theater, of which Arthur Lord is the manager, was too strong competition for the Lynn Theater.

Mr. "Mike" R. Sheedy and Mr. John Cooney opened the new Union Square Theater, Pittsfield, Mass., recently, to big business. The Union Square is dedicated to the policy of vaudeville and motion pictures. The house is a first-class one in every way, and indications point to success. Mr. Sheedy is one of the best-known of New England moving picture and vaudeville men, having been identified with this business for years.

Mr. R. Marcil, of Ottawa, Can., and C. F. Hicklin, of Calgary, Alta., were elected trustees of the Theatrical Mechanics' Association at the meeting held at Spokane, Wash., last week. Mr. R. C. Newman, of Toronto, Ont., was elected secretary-treasurer.

The Dominion Theater, Ottawa, Can., of which Mr. J. F. Clancy is manager, brought its season of stock-company attractions to a close this week when the house shut down. Mr. Clancy reports that he will reopen his theater on August 25th, but not with stock shows. Vaudeville and feature pictures have been chosen to turn the trick for the Dominion Theater on the new season. Some alterations and repairs will be made in this house while it is "dark."

Shea's Theater, Toronto, is now playing stock-company productions, but vaudeville and photoplays are scheduled on and after July 28th.

The Massachusetts Motion Picture Theater Company, with offices at 176 Federal Street, Boston, is sending around advertising matter, which urges the purchase of its common stock, if you want to make really big money. This corporation is duly incorporated under the laws of Massachusetts.

THE GOVERNOR (August 4).—Helen Cheston, an heiress, is loved by John Hall, the young governor, a poor man. Bitter experience has caused her to suspect all men not wealthy of being fortune hunters. A railway bill has been passed by the Legislature and awaits the governor's signature. It is popularly thought to be a measure granting privileges to a favored few at the expense of the public, and it is confidently expected that the governor will veto it. Helen overhears an assertion that the governor can be bought, and determines to put his honor and honesty to the test. She tells him that she can never marry a poor man, and, accepting this as final dismissal, he leaves her. She arranges that a broker shall tell the governor how $20,000 can be made to yield a quick fortune. She then sends to the governor $20,000 in bills with an anonymous note stating that the sum is to be his in payment for approval of the railway bill; if he does not want the money, it may be deposited at a bank to the credit of John Doe. This money reaches the governor on Saturday afternoon. Sunday morning Helen is heartbroken to read that the governor has signed the railway bill. Everywhere it is believed that the executive approval was bought. On Monday Helen receives a proposal from another suitor, a millionnaire. Though she does not love him, she believes that he loves her for herself alone, and thinking that she will at least be less unhappy with him than at present, is upon the point of accepting him, when she receives a notice from the bank that the account of John Doe has been credited with a deposit of $20,000. Her faith in the governor restored, she refuses the millionaire. She comes to realize that she loves the governor, and, at length, putting aside all pride, tells him that she loves him and laughs at his reply that he is still poor and now in ill repute by reason of the railway bill. Her happiness is rendered complete when the governor's approval of the railway bill is justified, he alone having seen at first that, framed with the intent of defrauding the public, it would, in reality, redound to the people's benefit.

ROSES FOR ROSIE (August 5).—Dick Hendricks and Jack Hall are militant rivals for the favors of Rosie Forrest. One day Dick sends the young lady a box of roses, and Jack, being present, gets awfully peeved. There is a lover's quarrel and Jack leaves in a huff. As he passes the store his tailor gives him a box containing a pair of trousers which had been left to be pressed. Still on his way home, Jack passes a florist, and entering, buys a box of roses for Rosie, as a peace offering. He attaches a note to the flowers requesting that she wear them in place of Dick's. In his excitement he puts the card on the box containing the pants and carries home the box of roses. Arriving at his lodging he discovers his mistake and rushes frantically back to the florist, but the boy has just started on the errand to deliver. Jack chases the boy, but a policeman stops him, wanting to know why he is running. Then he proceeds, and on arriving at Rosie's house, lacks the courage to pull the bell. Rosie comes around the corner with a handsome bunch of roses. Jack is dumbfounded, and goes to see what has become of his pants. Meantime the box has been delivered to an old maid, who goes to the store to get explanation. By the time Jack gets there the store is wrecked, so is the florist, so is the boy, so are the trousers, and Jack has a narrow escape.

GETTING MARRIED (August 5).—Harry Myers has a wealthy uncle, Peter Smith, who lives in New York. One morning Harry receives a letter from uncle declaring that if Harry does not marry by midnight, February 15, he will cancel a clause in his will leaving him $100,000. Smith at the time has just taken unto himself a beautiful young bride, who knows nothing of Harry. She visits Mr. and Mrs. Morris, in Chicago, who write her to come and meet "some fine young men" in their city. Harry happens to be one. He is invited to a ball given by Mr. and Mrs. Morris. This falls on the night of February 15. Smith has grown desperately jealous of his wife during her absence. He boils over at the thought of "the fine young men" who must be making advances to his young bride. In this frame of mind he packs up and starts for Chicago. He sends a telegram ahead to Harry, notifying him he will arrive on the night of February 15. Harry receives the telegram in the midst of the gayety of the ball. It is then 11.30. He is desperate. He sees a vision of the $100,000 melting away. Rushing into the ballroom he explains his predicament and urges that some one of the women present allow herself to be introduced as his wife, "just for fun." He appeals to Joyce Morris, a daughter of the hosts, to whom he is really attached, but she refuses. Mrs. Smith happens to hear the request, falls into the spirit of the joke and offers to oblige, never dreaming he is the nephew of her husband. Meanwhile, Uncle Smith calls at Harry's headquarters and is directed from there to the ball. Mrs. Smith is brought forward. "Uncle," says Harry, "this is my wife." Smith utters one shriek, then collapses. His worst fears are true, his wife has played him false. The guests are in an uproar. Smith draws a pistol and rushes from the ballroom to kill himself. Joyce faints and is received in Harry's arms. Harry escapes from the turmoil, carrying Joyce into an adjoining room. He kisses her, realizing that he really loves her. In the other room Pete starts to shoot himself, but loses his nerve. He then prepares to hang himself with a table-cloth. Meanwhile, Harry, with one eye on the clock, urges Joyce to marry him. He rushes from the room with an idea, locking Joyce inside. He joins the guests in the ballroom and together they rush into the room occupied by Smith in time to prevent him from jumping from the center table with the table cloth about his neck. Matters are explained. Harry then rushes back to Joyce. Frantic with haste he shows her the letter regarding his inheritance. Joyce can no longer conceal her affection, and agrees to an immediate marriage. A minister is present and they are pronounced man and wife just as the clock strikes twelve.

THE CAMERA'S TESTIMONY (August 7).—At Wolfville during a dance at the home of Sheriff Duncan, Jim Nash, who is slightly intoxicated, has an altercation with Tom Jordan. By quick interference Duncan averts trouble and pacifies the men. The next day Tom accompanies Dollie Winters on a trip to the wild ranch country to assist her in photographing birds and animals in their native wilds. Being unsuccessful while holding the camera and becoming tired waiting for the animals to pose, Tom suggests that the camera be set with a string attachment and a bait, that any bird or animal touching the bait will be photographed. They leave the camera and arrange to meet there on the morrow. The next morning Jim Nash finds a Mexican abusing his favorite horse, and discharging him, wins the enmity of Garcia, who vows vengeance, and knowing the direction he will take when he leaves the ranch, the Mexican precedes Nash and decoys him into the woods in the immediate vicinity of the camera. Meanwhile Tom has returned to the camera, and finding that the trap has not been sprung, he fires his gun at a bird, which has not been thoughtful enough to pose. While adjusting the cover of the trap, Tom drops his gun and wanders away to look for Dollie. By a strange coincidence, Nash is led to the exact place of the camera trap and the Mexican firing, causes him to fall across the string which operates the shutter. Tom, hearing the shot, rushes in and finds Nash dead, sees his revolver on the ground, recovers it and stands, gun in hand, over the dead man as Dollie and the sheriff, whom she has met on the road, come upon him. The circumstantial evidence is strong against Tom and he is about to be convicted when Dollie thought of what the camera might reveal. It is found to bring out the facts in the case, and Garcia, the guilty man, is taken, while Tom is cleared of the charge of murder.

HER HUSBAND'S WIFE (August 8).—David Boone leaves his suburban home for the city, and his wife is to follow in a few days. He takes their trunks with him and registers for himself and wife at the city hotel, telling the clerk she will be with him soon. Later he gets a telegram from her saying that her mother is ill and she won't be able to meet him for a week. That night Annie Robie, a young girl, desperate from want of food, enters his room to rob him. He has just lain down on the couch and succeeds in catching her. She tells him her story and his heart is touched. He tells her to help herself to his wife's clothes and to meet him downstairs in the dining room and he will give her dinner and some money. Downstairs he runs into his Aunt Delia, who has never met his wife, and has come to see her. David tells her he is sorry, but his wife is not with him. Annie, from exhaustion and want of food, faints after she is dressed and a maid hearing the noise, goes downstairs and tells David his wife has fainted, and he has to tell his aunt that he fibbed to her because his wife was ill. He tries to go to her alone, but Aunt Delia insists on going also. Reviving Annie, he gets deeper in the tangle by introducing her to his aunt as his wife. Annie has to make the part good and follow them down to the dining room. David excuses himself and sends a telegram to himself calling him out of town, and when it is delivered in the dining room, tells the women that he is called out of town at once, and that Annie must go with him, thinking to get rid of them both. But he reckoned without the aunt, who persists upon taking Annie with her for a week to her country place, while David is away on business. David does not know what to do, but as he told Annie on the side to get away as soon as possible from the aunt, he has hopes of hearing no more of it. Annie tries to get away, but a hurt ankle brings into her life the aunt's neighbor, Abel Jackson. Their acquaintance soon ripens into love. Meanwhile David gets a letter from his wife, saying she is going to stop off and make the acquaintance of his Aunt Delia. Frantic, he jumps a train to intercept her there. Abel tells Annie of his love, and she, to save herself, tells him the whole story. He gets her to agree to elope with him that night. While she elopes the back way, David's wife arrives by the front way, and the aunt is in for a bad situation. In order to settle the argument, they go to Annie's room and find her gone. Meanwhile, Annie and Abel have been married and at the train meet David. Explanations are made and they agree to go back with him, so that he can square himself. His wife at first refuses to accept any explanation, but with Abel's assistance the mixup is untangled.

WHEN TONY PAWNED LOUISA (August 9).—When Tony Roig arrived in America he had very little money, but was told he could increase it considerably at the gambling table. Tony was good to look at and the sharks looking upon him as a useful member, allowed him to win until he had $200 to the good. With part of this capital he sent to Italy for his mother and Louisa, his sweetheart. In due time they arrived and were installed in humble lodgings. Tony's good fortune did not last and presently he found himself embarrassed. Among his acquaintances was one Josef Vochman, a pawn broker, and Tony approached him for the modest sum of $150. Vochman usually got collatteral for his loans, but Tony had nothing to offer. Vochman made a strange proposition. He knew that Louisa was pretty and he would loan the money for a week, if he would send the girl to his home as a pledge. She would be useful in the shop to clean the jewelry and dress the window, and as he, Vochman, had a good mother, Louisa would be well cared for. The proposition was resented by Tony, but he was in a fix for the money must be had. When Louisa and Tony's mother heard of the proposition, they made a terrible protest. The girl declared that she could not be pulled there with horses. She upbraided her sweetheart for his mode of living. Why did he not get a push cart like Sofia Kirofsky's man and sell apples, or get an organ and play tunes in the park. These ideas did not suit Tony's ambition, he must play for bigger game than that, and with threats of force he dragged the poor girl to the pawn shop and Cochman counted out the money. Remember, for only a week. Vochman's home was more comfortable than the tenement, and really, Josef and the mother treated her very kindly. She would look pop-eyed at the diamonds as she took them from the safe and polished them for the show cases. Altogether the life was an improvement. One evening while putting the jewelry away, Josef loaded her fingers with diamonds and hung pearl necklaces around her neck until she looked like an Oriental princess. Louisa laughed with joy and Josef told her that they might be hers if Tony did not come soon to restore the money and redeem the pledge. But the week passed and several more weeks, but Louisa's sweetheart did not show up. At last, one evening, he came, dressed in the loudest kind of suit. He wore a heavy watch chain and took out a gold watch and threw it back into his checkered vest pocket. He then pulled out a roll of bills and counted out the money loaned. He was prosperous now—he had become a politician. Josef and Louisa smiled as the young Italian demanded his girl, but Vochman told him he was too late—the pledge was only for a week—and as the time had long since passed, the pledge was forfeited; in short, Josef and Louisa had that morning been married.

HONOR THY FATHER (Special—2 parts—July 25).—Broken-hearted, Count Castel dies, leaving a will which completely disinherits his dissipated son Charles and the Countess Castel. His entire fortune goes to his beloved daughter, Marie, with the strict provision that she is never to allow the control of the property to pass from her.

Shortly after, John Ruggles, a mining engineer, leases the marble quarries on the Castel estate. He falls in love with Marie, who reciprocates the affection. The brother Charles, meanwhile, has involved himself with an unscrupulous banker named Samuels, who, learning that Charles is disinherited, conspires with the mother and brother against Marie.

This plot is overheard by Marie and she flies, panic-stricken, into the forest, where Ruggles finds her hours later. He places her in charge of his aunt. In the interim, the trio locate Marie, and after a struggle, forcibly take her home. Ruggles is then assaulted and left to die in an old, deserted building. He escapes by an ingenious trick and gathering his mine workers together, hastens to the rescue of Marie. He arrives just as the girl, her determination undermined by the events of the past few weeks, is about to sign away the Castel estates to the sharper Samuels. How Ruggles solved the difficult problem and rendered both mercy and justice makes a highly sensational climax to a thoroughly interesting story.

THE RED OLD HILLS OF GEORGIA (August 1).—Fred Bonsell, a young mining engineer, is sent to Georgia to investigate some mineral property. In a little backwoods settlement he meets Pinkie Floyd and her brother, Bub, who have had very few advantages and readily accept the magazines which Bonsall offers them. The stories and the pictures of the life which they have never seen make them want to improve their condition.

Their father wont hear of any improvement and tears one of the magazines to pieces. Yet after much coaxing on Pinkie's part, the father consents to a plan to make some money by raising chickens. The building of the chicken yard is the starting point of a general improvement of the little farm.

Fred Bonsall returns to the city with a very warm spot in his heart for the girl and sends books which Pinkie and Bud read from cover to cover. Two years later, Bonsall finds that a remarkable transformation has taken place on the Floyd farm. Neatly painted fences and other improvements have taken the place of the old disorder. Pinkie takes him to see the big chicken yards, but Bonsall spends most of his time looking at Pinkie, who has become a beautiful woman.

Bonsall discovers that a hill which was left to Pinkie by her mother has very valuable mineral deposits and informs the girl of her good luck. He informs her at the same time that he loves her.

THE ROBBERS (August 2).—Charles, the favorite son of Count Moor is in love with Amelia, his father's niece and ward. Charles's brother Francis, a sly, jealous man, hates him. As a consequence of a drunken brawl, Charles is expelled from the University at Leipsic. He then writes an appealing letter to his father and retires to Weingart in Bohemia to await the count's forgiveness. Francis intercepts his brother's letter and replaces it with another of his own composition to which he forges Charles's signature. The Count makes Francis his sole heir. To the penitent Charles in Bohemia, the news of his father's decision comes. Careless of consequences, he readily assents to the plan of his companions to form a band of robbers with himself as captain.

Francis, with the aid of Herman, an enemy of his brother's, make the old Count believe that Charles has been killed in battle, and he falls apparently lifeless at the terrible news. But, as he is being interred, Francis discovers that his father in not dead. However, he does not falter. He forces his horrified father into the vault and furnishes him with barely enough food to keep him alive.

Meanwhile, Charles visits his father's castle in disguise, and discovers the full extent of his brother's treachery. Summoning his band, he storms the castle, liberates his father, and shuts Francis up in the dungeon.

Amelia, who has fought against the daily importunities of the wicked brother, now fully realizing Charles' true character, flies to him. He stretches out his arms to her, but the bandits interpose their swords between the lovers. Charles has consecrated his life to them and cannot have Amelia. The desperate girl prays them to kill her as life is no longer of any value. Charles gives himself up to the authorities, arranging in his last moments of freedom that the reward for his capture shall be paid to a worthy peasant.

This he does.

The poor girl is terrified but assured by the detective that she was just going to have a little vacation. A lady detective is sent to take her place, and at the end of three days she had two of the clerks under arrest.

But she did not detect that one young man of the firm was sadly depressed because of the absence of the stenographer. He was a nice young man and she liked him. But Mr. Clark was so much occupied in welcoming the old stenographer back that he had no time even to say goodbye to the detective. It hurt her a little, but it had to be.

DOLLY VARDEN (August 5).—Dolly, a born coquette, is the daughter of Gabriel Varden, a prosperous locksmith. She scoffs at the devotion of Joe Willets, and flouts and rebuffs him in favor of other less worthy men. The day after he rescues Dolly from Hugh, a drunken hostler, Joe Willets takes courage and proposes to Dolly. For the benefit of Simon, her father's assistant, Dolly cruelly plays with Joe's feelings, finally refusing him flatly. Broken-hearted, Joe enlists in the royal army and goes to the wars. On his return, five years later, he has gained distinction on account of his heroic conduct and has lost his left arm in the service of his country. The Lord George Gordon riots are in full progress in London. Simon, a power among the rioters, delivers Gabriel Varden over to his companions. They drag the old man to Newgate Prison, to persuade him to make a key to open the gate. Finding him obdurate, their entreaties and promises give place to curses and threats, and finally to blows. Jos Willets, in the costume of a rioter, recognizes his old friend and by a harangue liberates him from the mob.

Joe and Varden return to discover that Dolly has been abducted. Simon and Hugh, the hostler, have taken advantage of her father's absence to seize the girl and carry her off to a rendezvous of the rioters. Mrs. Varden discovers this rendezvous from a scrap of paper dropped on the floor by Hugh, and Joe Willets and Varden set off to the rescue. They arrive with the police just in time to save Dolly from Simon.

Chastened by her terrible experience, Dolly comes into a full realization of what Joe's great love for her is really worth. And so, despite his fears that his lost arm will make his case more hopeless than ever, she accepts him, and everything ends happily.

THE ROMANCE OF ROWANA (August 6).—Sir Harry Causton, a dashing young "buck" of the days of George Fourth, lately removed to the country, pays a visit to his neighbors, Sir John and Lady Travers. They show him a miniature of their daughter, Rowena, who is studying in a convent school.

The young man falls in love with the portrait, and questions the parents about their daughter. Pleased at the interest of so eligible a young man, Sir John Travers writes to Rowena, and tells her to come home.

When Rowena receives the letter, she is reading a forbidden romance to two or three of her schoolmates. Her father's remarks to the effects that a young nobleman desires her hand in marriage cause a pitying smile to appear on her lips. With her mind full of the romantic tale she writes to her mother informing her that the man she will marry must be brave and strong, and must know the true spirit of romance.

Sir John shows his daughter's letter to the young man who is rather amused at the girl's spirit, and resolves to win her by his own methods.

He disguises himself as a highwayman, and waylays Rowena on her way home, carries her off and protests his love for her in the most approved romantic manner. The servants rallying from their fright, surround and capture the audacious highwayman who has stolen their mistress. At Rowena's wish, the highwayman is released. As he leaves, he seizes her in his arms and kisses her on the mouth. To Rowena's horrified delight, the highwayman comes to a masked ball at Worth Hall.

HIS GREATEST VICTORY (August 8).—Jane Doone has promised to marry Lieutenant John Blake and a reception is held by the girl's relatives to announce it. In the midst of the merrymaking Blake is ordered to the front, so a hasty wedding is performed and Blake departs for the war.

In his first engagement, Blake behaves like a hero and saves the colors from his enemy. He is left for dead on the battlefield. When he regains consciousness he gives his coat to one of his comrades and picks up a canteen on which the name of John Stokes is printed. He then drags himself to a sentry outpost. After a six weeks' struggle between life and death in the hospital, he at length emerges sound in body, but with his memory blank.

The name of John Stokes seems to him to be the most plausible clue to his own identity and he re-enlists under that name. Blake has been reported missing. To Jane, the first sorrow of her lose is gradually softened by time.

Two years later the war is over. Crane who was at Blake's wedding is an ardent suitor for her hand. She at last consents and journeys out to the army post of which Crane is in command.

Blake is also there bearing the name of John Stokes and Crane sees and recognizes him, and succeeds in clearing Blake's muddled brain by bringing up old recollections. Thus the long separated husband and wife are reunited.

THE FORTUNE HUNTERS OF HICKSVILLE (Aug. 4).—Great excitement is caused at the Hicksville postoffice and general store when a letter arrives addressed to Miss Abigail Pecksniff, the old maid of the village. When Miss Pecksniff comes in later for some groceries, the postmaster hands her the letter, much to her surprise. She opens it and finds that it is from a lawyer telling her that her old uncle has left her his entire fortune, a check being enclosed. The postmaster and one of the loungers read the letter over her shoulder and communicate the intelligence to the others present, as soon as the old maid has gone.

When she is well out of the way, the men eagerly discuss the matter and wonder what she will do with her newly-acquired wealth. The same idea seems to occur to all of them and they leave the store for their homes, where each of them dolls himself up, intending to visit Miss Abigail and offer her his hand and heart. Each of the men takes a present. Each of the four men receives a surprise when he finds the others at the old maid's cottage. Miss Abigail ushers them all into her sitting-room and upbraids them for trying to get her money. A feeling of relief succeeds the sensation of chagrin when she shows them the check that had accompanied her letter. After all expenses have been paid, her old uncle's estate amounts to just one dollar.

A FAITHFUL SERVANT (Aug. 5).—Count Guilio di Rossali, a young nobleman, visits Beppo, one of his father's old servants, who lives with his daughter Nina at the house of Pietro Veccio, a police spy. Beppo, not being aware that Pietro is a spy, allows him to overhear his conversation with di Rossali and obtains admission to a socialistic meeting. Pietro gives information to the police, with the result that a warrant is issued against the young nobleman, who is obliged to take flight from the country. He visits Beppo before leaving, and is again seen by Pietro.

Nina refuses to listen to the suit of Pietro, who swears he will be revenged upon her. He informs the Police that Guilio had called upon Beppo, who is commanded to reveal his hiding-place. Beppo refuses to do so and as a result is condemned to penal servitude as an accomplice. As he is being taken into the prison, Nina denounces Pietro as an informer to the crowd at the gates, who at once vent their fury upon him. Pietro is dragged to the river and drowned like the rat he is.

For three years Nina lives in poverty and hardship, making a scanty living by the manufacture of artificial flowers. At last she hears that, through a political change, the Count di Rossali is restored to favor and that he is returning from banishment to take charge of his estates. She at once goes in search of him and tells him the pitiful story of her father's incarceration. The Count immediately uses his influence to get Beppo out of prison and restores him to his daughter. He commends Beppo as a faithful servant, and gives him an important post in his household so that neither he nor his daughter need know want again.

THE LATE MR. JONES (Aug. 6).—Matilda Jones, a widow, is resolved never to marry a man who does not measure up to the standard of her late husband. She goes away to spend a month at the beach and while there meets Clarence Kipp, who is on his vacation. Clarence falls in love with her at first sight, but is much discouraged at hearing so much about the prowess of the late Mr. Jones. Temple, Mrs. Jones' young hopeful, keeps him constantly informed on this subject and makes life miserable for him.

Convinced that he cannot win the widow, Clarence determines to go away and finish his vacation elsewhere. Having written the widow a letter, telling her of his intention and saying that he will reappear when he has done something worthy of her late husband, he takes it to her room and places it on her bureau. Temple sees him enter the room and locks the door on him.

Clarence is aghast and does not know what to do. He absolutely dares not risk discovery there. Getting out of the room, he attempts to get down the water chute to the ground, but Temple gets there first. He places a rain barrel, full of water, at the bottom of the chute, with the result that Clarence lands in it and gets soaked to the skin as well as covered with slime. Seeing Temple, Clarence offers him a quarter to get him a suit from his suit-case and bring it to the woodshed. Instead of getting him his own suit, however, he brings Clarence a suit that had been worn by his father. Clarence cuts a sorry figure, and still in this attire, he meets the widow, who, instead of laughing at him, is filled with compassion. She offers no objections when Clarence gives Temple a good thrashing and forces a confession from the boy that he can spank as well as father, anyway. Mrs. Jones allows Clarence to take her in his arms and confesses, that, although not quite such a giant as her late husband, she loves him just as

THE PENALTIES OF REPUTATION (Aug. 7).—Ned Lawlor, an incorrigible flirt, is invited to spend his vacation with Charlie Maybury and his wife, Laura. They also invite Mary Fleming, an old school friend of Laura's, but tell her of Ned's well-known tendencies. Mary replies that she considers herself a match for the worst flirt in creation.

Ned and Mary get along famously together, each of them flirting most outrageously with the other. Before he knows what has happened to him, Ned finds that he has really fallen in love with Laura and makes still more ardent protestations to her of his undying devotion. Laura finds that she is falling in love with Ned and resolves to get away in order to save herself future pain. She writes to her mother, asking her to send a telegram calling her home, as she does not wish to appear voluntarily to retire from the field.

Ned, who has already secured Laura's photograph, asks her for one of her pretty curls. She will not allow him to cut one from her head, but tells him that she will give him what he wants the next time they meet. In her bedroom, Laura cuts a curl from a false cluster and gives it to Ned, who is quite satisfied with it.

The telegram arrives calling Laura home and she goes to bid everyone goodbye. She is very indignant with Ned, who had tried to kiss her the day before, and decides not to see him alone. An accident throws her into his society and she sees the way in which he treasures the curl and the photograph. Realizing that he truly loves her, Laura tells him of her little deception and offers to let him take one of her real curls. Instead of a curl, Ned takes the girl into his arms and receives her sweet confession of love. Mr. and Mrs. Maybury are about the most surprised people in the world when they come to them with the news of the engagement.

A GENTLEMAN OF FASHION (August 8).—Being somewhat bored by her own society, Nannette Stevens, an heiress, goes out alone one evening unchaperoned, in spite of the objections of her serious-minded sister, Genevieve. While passing down the street she is knocked down by a taxi and falls heavily in the roadway. The occupant of the taxi, James Ogilvie, gets out and assists her to her feet. He invites her to enter the cab and offers to take her home. When they are alone in the taxi, however, he asks her to accompany him to dinner instead, which invitation she accepts. Nannette will not allow him to take her home at the end of the evening, but returns by herself.

James Oglivie is a plumber's man and is rather fond of making a splurge. One evening at least every week he is in the habit of donning his dress suit and going forth as a man of fashion. It is on such an evening that the meeting with Nannette has taken place.

The next morning the Stevens' house is dead cold, for the steam heating furnace is out of order. The housekeeper telephones to the plumbers to have a man sent out on the job. Nannette recognizes her escort of the evening before, but gets away before he sees her.

Upstairs, she calls to her maid and changes clothes with her. Going to the cellar again she allows Ogilvie to speak to her and he, believing that she is the maid of the house, commences to make ardent love to her again. Before he goes she invites him to take tea with her that afternoon in the servant's kitchen.

Other meetings follow in which James becomes more and more in love with Nannette. At last she tells him the truth, and, thinking that she has just been playing with him, James turns to go away. She calls him back to her, however, and draws his arms around her neck. She tells him that she truly loves him, in spite of her wealth, and begs him not to desert her in her new-found happiness. James is nothing loth and presses her to his heart in fond embrace.

THE LINE-UP (Special—2 Parts) (August 9).—Larry Pendleton, the captain of the Rexton football team, tries to persuade Dan Harwood, the great quarterback of the Transylvania team, to enter a professional foot race. He is jealous because Edith Livingston seems to favor Danny more than he and knows well that Dan is the mainstay of his team, which is to play Rexton the coming week. Harvey Livingston, Edith's brother, is a somewhat worthless reprobate but is kept more or less straight by Danny. He becomes treasurer of the Transylvania team through the combination of his father's and Dan's influence. Harvey, who is going rapidly to the dogs, takes some of the money entrusted to his care and spends it on a bunch of chorus girls. The next morning, when he is sober, he goes to Dan and confesses what he has done. In order that the brother of the girl he loves shall not fall into disgrace, Dan accepts the proposition to race professionally, although he knows that he will jeopardize his position with his team.

Dan insists that the check for the race which he wins, be made out to Harvey Livingston, greatly surprising Thompson, the athletic promoter. Thompson makes out the check as requested and hands it to Dan after the race. The day of the great game between Rexton and Transylvania arrives. Pendleton challenges Dan, saying that he is a professional and he is not allowed to play. Willie Jones, Dan's friend, who suspects that something is wrong about the matter, sets off in his car for the bank and succeeds in getting the check that has been made out to Harvey Livingston. When he brings it back, the whole miserable business is exposed and Dan allowed to take his place on the team for the close of the game. Within a comparatively short time, Dan changes the score from 10 to 0 against Transylvania to 10 to 12, scoring a touchdown a few seconds before the blowing of the whistle, thus saving the game and winning the heart of the girl for whom he made such a sacrifice.

KALEM.

INTEMPERANCE (August 4).—John Brent, the young minister, is well beloved by the members of his congregation. He makes his home with his sister, Kitty, who is his constant companion. It is with no little unhappiness that Brent sees Kitty falling in love with Bert, a young man of the village, who is often given to intemperance. The girl hopes to be the means of saving Bert from his one bad habit and prevails upon him to enter the church.

Bert apparently lives down his taste for liquor and Brent finally approves of the marriage. But a number of misfortunes come to the husband and he seeks the consolation of the weak. The little home becomes the scene of many sorrows. When Kitty can no longer endure Bert's reprehensible habits she takes her child and returns to the minister's residence. Brent meets her at the door and hears her pitiful story. He insists that it is her duty to remain with her husband and bids her go back to him.

Kitty obeys, but the minister, full of apprehension, follows. He is just in time to save his sister from an act of violence on the part of the crazed husband. That night Bert discovers that Kitty has gone to her brother's. He stealthfully enters Brent's house during the absence of the minister and is about to commit a greater crime when he is intercepted by a burglar.

THE HOBO AND THE HOBBLE SKIRT (August 6).—On his way home Smith is caught in a shower. He slips in the mud and soils his clothes. Meanwhile Mrs. Smith has sent her husband's "other" suit to the cleaners and he is obliged to don one of her hobble skirts while he removes the mud and places the garment on the line to dry.

A prowling hobo discovers the suit and makes away with it. Smith calls on a kind neighbor who provides him with clothes.

Mrs. Smith has notified the police of the theft of the garments and her husband is arrested on his way back. Still clad in the hobble skirt he almost causes a riot when he makes his appearance at headquarters. How he gains his liberty is best told in the picture.

CONEY ISLAND (August 6).—A hot day in New York drives thousands of people to Coney Island and the surf. The Kalem photographer has caught the pleasure-seekers in the ocean, on the beach and enjoying scores of amusement devices. The Human Roulette Wheel, the Whirlpool, Motor Polo and many laugh-provoking exhibitions find favor with the huge crowd.

THE GIRL AND THE GANGSTER (Special— 2 parts—July 28).—The lazy and good-for-nothing father of Jessie Malone, depends solely for his subsistence upon the scanty earnings of his daughter as a salesgirl in a department store. She lives in constant dread of him, and her only ray of sunshine is the companionship of Bunk Woods, a gangster, but a fellow with a sympathetic nature. Many a time he has rescued her from the tyrannical outbursts of her father. Handsome Harry, who has been exposed for double dealing by Bunk, decides to revenge himself and one evening as Jessie is coming home, he accosts her. Bunk happens to witness the assault and goes to the aid of Jessie. An unfortunate incident causes Harry's death and Bunk is accused, arrested and sentenced to prison. During his incarceration, Con Kelly, one of his pals, has been the sole support of his aged mother, and when his sentence is commuted for good behavior, he returns home to his happy mother and faithful Jessie.

Some days later Jessie and one of her girl friends visit an amusement park, where they spend their week's wages. Jessie is afraid to go home and tell her father what she has done with the money, so, acting upon the suggestion of her friend, she throws away her purse and informs a policeman that she lost her purse, containing her week's wage. Bunk finds it and the officer brings him to Malone's home, where Jessie recognizes her property. It is empty, and Jessie, afraid to tell the truth on account of her father's temper, has Bunk arrested, much against her will. Learning of the trouble, Con Kelly, perceiving that Malone is the cause of all the outrages, goes to his home intent upon revenge. He discovers an infernal time clock that the old man was perfecting, and locking the door, so that Jessie and her father cannot escape, he sets the clock and runs away.

He encounters Bunk, who managed to escape from his captor, and who, upon hearing of his pal's act, reprimands him severely and goes to the tenement, where he succeeds in throwing the bomb out of the window just in time to prevent a terrible explosion inside the house. This causes the unraveling of the difficulties and as Jessie's father is led away to prison, she places herself in Bunk's care, he having secured a good position.

ESSANAY.

KING ROBERT OF SICILY (Special—2 parts—August 4).—Robert, King of Sicily, a proud and haughty monarch, scoffs at the church and proudly declares there is no power that can remove him from the throne. One evening, while at vespers in the church, Robert falls asleep. Afraid to awaken him the attendants steal away at the end of the service. Robert sleeps soundly far into the night, and awakens to find only a few candles flickering on the massive altar. Gazing with astonishment around him, Robert suddenly discovers that he is clothed in the rags of a beggar. Rage gaining possession of him, he escapes from the church and rushes to the palace throne room. Here he finds an angelic king seated upon the throne, wearing his robes, his crown and signet ring. Wild with fury Robert denounces the angel as an impostor, and is thrown into a dismal dungeon. Later he is visited by the angel, who again asks if he is still the king. Proudly Robert answers in the affirmative, and is further punished by being transformed into the court jester. The angel slowly fades from sight, and Robert finds himself with nothing but an ape for counsel. In the great banquet hall Robert is ridiculed by the pages when found eating scraps of food from the plates after the guests have gone. Still his pride dominates and his haughty answer—I am—I am the King!" saddens the angel, who realizes the task is not yet finished. As the Holy Week approaches the ambassadors from Pope Urbane summon the Angel king to Rome. At last Robert sees a way to dethrone the impostor, for is not the pope his own brother? Surely he will right the great wrong that has been done. So they depart o'er land and sea, into the lovely land of Italy.

Upon arriving in Rome the pope receives them with great pomp on St. Peter's Square, but Robert's hopes are dashed to earth when, after an impassioned appeal to his own brother, he finds the pope knows him not, and jests with the angel, saying, "It is strange sport to keep a madman at court." Seizing the furious Robert the guards imprison him in a cell. Easter Sunday gleams upon the sky and Robert, rising from his pallet, eagerly watches the people as they enter the church for early mass. Suddenly a celestial gleam of light falls upon his upturned face and, feeling within a power unfelt before, he kneels humbly, and for the first time lifts his voice in prayer. The Holy Week ending, the Angel King returns once more to Sicily. Now it is that Robert seems to feel the angelic presence of the impostor king, and humbles himself for the first time. Later, in the great throne room, Robert, still in his jester garb, gazes from the open casement and is aroused from his reverie by the sound of the vesper bells and the chanting of the monks near by. Watching him closely, the Angel King dismisses the court, and appearing before Robert, once more asks; "Art thou the king?" For a moment Robert hesitates, then crosses his hands meekly upon his breast and makes answer, "Thou knowest best." At this acknowledgment of his lowliness the angel reveals himself to the king and slowly fades from view with a last blessing. Discovering that he is once more clothed in his regal robes, King Robert impulsively goes alone to the church and there, kneeling before the holy altar, he silently prays, while a shaft of heavenly light breaks over the lofty crucifix and falls upon his humbled head.

HOMESPUN (August 5).—Grant Price and his wife, Inez, become estranged. Inez's father reads an article in the paper concerning the family friction, and decides to visit his daughter and try to bring about a reconciliation. Willing to put everything at stake for his daughter's happiness, he places the old letters about promiscuously, and Inez finding them, comes to the conclusion that she never stopped loving her husband.

THEIR PROMISE (August 6).—Fred Church and John Harding become engaged to Harriet and Marion. They leave their sweethearts to seek their fortune in the West. Church finds gold and divides his good fortune with his pal, Harding. In the act of mailing letters to their sweethearts, they meet a young lady novelist who is waiting for the stage. They both become infatuated with her and quarrel, Harding shooting Church in the wrist. Realizing their terrible mistake in quarreling over a mere stranger, they decide they will remain pals, stick together always, and fulfill their promise to their sweethearts.

THE INCRIMINATING LETTER (August 7).—Mr. Smith plans to surprise his wife with a pet dog. The owner of the dog sends him a note telling him that Rootsy Pootsy is his and to get rid of his old cat. His wife finds the note, and think-

MONA (August 6).—James Lee, a settler, comes to the assistance of Mona, daughter of Chief Big Turtle, who is struggling in the arms of an amorous prospector. Mona is very grateful for Lee's gentle courtesy. Later she falls in love with him and offers to become his squaw. Lee shows her the picture in a locket of the girl for whom he is making a home. Mona understands and departs sorrowfully. Wade, the prospector, witnesses this scene and vows vengeance on Lee.

He goes to the Indian camp and tells Big Turtle that Lee has designs on Mona. Wade takes Big Turtle to a point overlooking Lee's cabin and shows him Mona and Lee in what appears from the distance to be a love scene. Big Turtle is furious and calls his tribe together and they plan to do away with Lee. Lee and his sweetheart, Bessie, are quietly married in the meantime and Lee takes her to the little cabin in the clearing. Later the Indians waylay Lee by lassoing him and dragging him from his horse. They then proceed to a nearby corral and steal a green hide, from which they cut a long strip and bind Lee, knowing that as the hide dries, it will gradually strangle Lee.

Mona has watched the capture and preparation for the torture and after the Indians have taken their departure, she frees Lee. He, in gratitude, places the locket about Mona's neck. Wade, who has returned to gloat over his enemy, witnesses the act and vows vengeance on both. Wade tells Big Turtle that his daughter has freed the captive, and when Mona returns to the Indian camp she is driven away. She seeks Lee's cabin and is taken in. Later Wade poisons Bessie's mind by telling her that Lee and Mona were lovers in the past, and to prove his assertion tells her of Lee giving Mona the locket, which was a gift from Bessie. Bessie finds the locket about Mona's neck, and in bitter jealously runs away. She is lost and eventually makes her way to the Indian camp. There she is cared for by the squaws. Wade, who is following her, falls into a bear trap and dies. Lee finding Bessie missing, starts out in search of her. Mona, with Indian skill, trails the girl to the camp of Big Turtle. There husband and wife are reunited and Big Turtle relents, and takes Mona back into her home.

ALMOST A RESCUE (August 8).—May and Maud Smith are two sisters living in a hall room at Mrs. Prune's. They are out of work and very despondent. So is Jimmie, who occupies the room next to the girls. They are all delinquent in their board bill, and Jimmie tries to steal up to his room without the landlady seeing him, but Mrs. Prune comes out and demands her rent. Jimmie shows her a letter that he has prospects of a job, but she wants her money and refuses to allow him in the dining room, until he has paid. He goes to his room and on the way meets the two girls, who were fortunate enough to have had enough money to pay part of their board and thus entitled to a meal, at least. The girls attempt to smuggle Jimmie into the dining room, but the untimely appearance of Mrs. Prune frustrates their plan.

Jimmie is sitting in his room, disconsolate and hungry, when he hears voices in the adjoining room. He listens at the door and hears one of the girls exclaim "Here is a way out of our difficulties" and then "It's the only way. Let us dye together." Jimmie does not stop for more, but rushes away for help. And in the meantime—the girls had been reading an advertisement in the newspaper—a want ad— which calls for "two sisters for vaudevlle; must have blonde hair, etc.," and which brought forth the remarks Jimmie had heard. They decide it is their last hope to relieve their pressing need of money.

Jimmie fails to find a policeman so rushes to a detective agency and informs Hawkeye, the detective, that two girls are about to commit suicide. Jimmie and Hawkeye, with the latter's "fussies," watch the house, see one of the girls come out and follow her to a drug store. They are convinced she has gone to buy the poison. Hawkeye sends Jimmie for a doctor, while he and his men follow the girl back to the house. Jimmie arrives about the same time with the doctor, and they all enter the house and creep upstairs to the girls' door. When they burst into the room, they find the girls dying their hair. Explanations ensue, and the disgusted detective leaves with a glaring look from his "hawkeye" meant to whither the frightened Jimmie.

All this while Dad has been courting Jennie. He proposes, too, and likewise he is accepted. They arrange to keep their engagement a secret. The boys all arrange to beard the lion in his den. Dad simulates a terrible rage and banishes them forever. The boys leave. The girls are in despair. They send for the boys to come and say good-bye. The boys are interrupted by the entrance of Dad and Jennie and are astonished to learn that the lady is to be their new mamma. The boys are allowed to replace the rings upon the girl's fingers once more, and general rejoicing is in order.

WHEN THE PRINCE ARRIVED (August 7).—May, the daughter of a comfortably fixed farmer, being of a romantic turn of mind gives considerable time to reading love stories and fairy tales. Joe, the foreman of the farm, a frank, open-hearted youth, makes known his love for her. May, who finds him short on romance and scarcely in accord with her ideal of a lover, gently resents his advances. One day a circus comes to town and in the preparation of the show Bob and Frank, both acrobats, quarrel, and the latter is fallen and left for dead. The acrobat, frantic at his hasty deed, seeks refuge in the open country, where he happens upon May. The romantic girl, impressed by the oddity of his strange array of trunks and tights and such array as might become her imagnative ideas of a Prince, listens to Bob's appeal for aid and she gives him shelter.

The sheriff and posse pursue the fugitive to the farm house where they are thrown off their trail by May. She gives the mysterious stranger the necessary attire from a convenient scarecrow together with a horse, and instructs him to let the pony go that he will find the way back home alone. Bob grasps the chance of escape and gallops off, leaving the reader of fairy literature in a rather uncertain state of mind regarding her heart. Bob reaches safety, throws the bridle over the horse's head as instructed and the pony in due times arrives at the farm with a note fastened to the bridle. With beating heart May eagerly scans the message which reads as follows: "I could not look into your innocent eyes and tell you that the man you were aiding was a murderer. The future holds for me only one pleasant thought, a memory of your kindness. Forgive and forget."

A later scene shows the home of the acrobat. His wife is startled by a telegram which reads "If John communicates with you, tell him to join show. Frank only stunned. Newspaper report exaggerated. His old position open." The acrobat silently destroys a simple trophy of the girl he met and goes to his wife's arms, while at the distant farm, May is seen to respond to Joe's honest love and tosses the letter from her strange prince into the passing stream.

MAN'S DUTY (August 10).—The story opens in a Western dance hall. Flora, who is Bill's sweetheart, is taken ill. Bill, who has been drinking in the adjourning saloon, comes in and insists that she dance with him, but she escapes his embrace and leaves the hall with Bill following. Outside Flora confides to Bill that for the sake of a little soul to come she must leave the life she has been leading. Bill combats her desire and starts to take her back by force. Joe, the piano player for the dance hall who loves Flora, has followed the couple out and interferes with Bill's efforts to take Flora back into the hall. Flora escapes and Bill, after telling Joe to mind his own business, re-enters the hall and starts dancing with another girl. Joe, follows Flora to her little cabin and asks to marry her, but she refuses. Notwithstanding this refusal, Joe devotes himself to her welfare until after a child is born and he takes the blame for her degradation upon himself.

A year has passed and a blind girl and her father come to town. The old man is unable to proceed and dies, leaving the blind girl helpless. She strays into a canyon and meets Bill and tells him of the tragedy. Bill sees in her a new victim and takes her to his cabin. She is about to enter when he seizes her with intent to kiss her, but in the very act, something in the blind appeal in her eyes causes him to release his intended victim, and, carefully taking her into the cabin, he leaves her. Going to a nearby cabin he secures the services of a woman to look after the blind girl while he takes his blanket and sleeps on the ground outside the cabin. In the meantime he has buried the father and after lapse of time, proposes marriage to the blind girl and is accepted. Joe happens to be a witness to the scene of love and hurrying to the cabin of Flora informs her of the instance, hoping thereby to gain her consent to a union with him. Instead, she rushes from the cabin and finds Bill and the blind girl in each other's embrace. She pleads with Bill to return to her and protect the child, but Bill roughly forces her from him and sends her back to her cabin. He then turns to the blind girl to renew his embraces but she gently repels him and points out his duty. Unwillingly he listens and unwillingly obeys and in the end gets the preacher, takes him to Flora's cabin and has the ceremony performed. Joe exits from the cabin leaving the couple together. The blind girl is left with bowed head on the path where she parted from Bill.

The mother learns that Jim is going away, leaving his promise unfulfilled. He has started down the mountain stream in his canoe. The mother follows on horseback, overtakes him, and, at the point of a revolver, forces him to return. A mountaineer parson marries Gertrude and Jim, the bridegroom's reluctance overcome by the mother's pistol. This accomplished she orders Jim to go, and once free he takes to his canoe.

Dick arrives, followed by the mountaineers, whom he has told of his injuries and who are bent on vengeance. The mother explains the situation to them and they abandon their quest. But Jim is not to escape Nature's vengeance for his injury to her child. He is caught in the whirling rapids of the stream, his canoe is capsized, and his body is carried down through the angry waters to the quieter below. Gertrude is left to forget the stranger, and in time her reception of a little gift from Cooley shows that her future holds hope of happiness.

The next day, Henly and his wife are out in the park, driving in their automobile, when Nelson catches sight of his arch enemy. Upon seeing these unmistakeable signs of wealth and happiness about Henly and after ruminating over his own lot, Nelson jumps on the back of the machine, riding there until the couple arrive at home. Nelson bides his time and then enters the house. He finds Henly in the parlor and strangles him nearly to death. Henly's cries bring his wife and child to his rescue, and the child comes between the two men. Nelson recognizes the child as one who had befriended him the day before and

Motion Picture Rectifier Set Front View

Better Light for Your Machine

An arc lamp using direct current from a G-E Rectifier gives the finest light that can be obtained. The light is powerful and does not flicker like the light of an alternating current arc.

The G-E Rectifier not only improves the quality of the light, but at the same time it reduces the cost for current, because the rectifier furnishes current at the exact voltage needed by the lamp. Losses in rheostats are therefore entirely eliminated.

THE SNAKE (2 parts—August 9).—A visit from Captain Dan to Mona, at the Indian village, rouses the jealousy of the Snake, a snake priest. He attempts to kill Dan, but is foiled by Mona. Dan, leaving Mona after a love scene, returns to the fort, followed by Snake. Snake, thinking it an easy matter to take the fort, incites the Indians to the attack by means of the snake dance, showing the mode of catching the serpents, washing them, Indian magic, etc. The captain and a friend, while out riding, are attracted by the dancers; but when they ride up to observe the dance, the Snake and his Indians surround him. Mona again holds the tribe back, and then jumping on the horse behind Dan, rides back to the fort, pursued by Snake and a few Indians. At the fort a warm reception is prepared for the Indians, but Snake, perceiving their intention, professes friendship, which the colonel accepts in spite of warnings. Later, the Snake returns to the fort, and while his men are firing it, he runs off with Mona. Captain Dan, learning of this, follows, and is lured into the desert to die by the wily Snake.

Snake makes Mona his prisoner. Dan comes into the village and sees the Snake threaten to throw Mona into the snake pit if she does not agree to come to him. Snake places Mona back in his lodge, and Dan goes into the lodge to try and help the girl away. Snake discovers Dan and surrounds the abode with his men. When Mona and Dan emerge Dan is made prisoner and Mona escapes. Dan offers to fight for Mona and Snake accepts the challenge, but by a deadly means. He places a large snake on a blanket on the lodge floor and bares his arm to it, daring Dan to do the same.

The Friendly, who helped Dan on the desert, comes to the village with the cavalry, and the colonel looks through the village until he finds the strange duel going on. A sharpshooter who has been called shoots the snake between the duelists. But too late—Snake has been bitten by the deadly serpent and lies dead, while Dan and Mona are released from their bonds.

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH (August 6).—Mrs. Newton, regardless of her great wealth, leads an idle, useless life, and, at thirty-five, finds little pleasure or joy in living. Her seven-year-old daughter, Blanche, is given over to the care of nurses, and the mother sees her but seldom. One afternoon, as Mrs. Newton is idly reading, Blanche comes happily from school with a note for her mother. The children of Blanche's school have formed a Helping Hand Society for making provision for the children of the poor, and the mothers of the school children are asked to join the society and personally assist in the work.

Mrs. Newton tells her daughter she cannot be worried with such affairs and little Blanche goes away in tears. Resuming her reading, her glance accidentally rests upon the poem, "The Village Blacksmith," and Mrs. Newton realizes, as she visualizes the poem, that her life is tiresome because it is useless. She regrets her unwillingness to help her little daughter in her society, and hurries to the nursery to retract her refusal. Blanche is found, ready for bed, and is in tears, the nurse attempting to console her. Sending the nurse away, Mrs. Newton puts Blanche to bed and makes her happy by a promise to join the society. Blanche falls asleep contentedly upon her mother's shoulder, and as a last vision of the blacksmith appears before her, Mrs. Newton realizes the import of the words:

> "Something attempted, something done,
> He has earned a night's repose."

THE HEART OF A HEATHEN (2 parts—August 8).—Edward Alexander, unmarried and rich, makes his home with his mother and sister. The family, upon detecting burglary in their home, discharge the guilty servant and later decide to close their house and go for a motoring trip in the West. Old Woo, a peaceful Celestial, who by deprivation and honest toil, has at last reached a state of small independence by conducting a little laundry in a Western border town, goes forth from his laundry—only to return later finding his small establishment in flames. Grief-stricken, he sinks before the burning rooms in which are indeed all his hope and ambitions.

Alexander, during his motoring trip, happens upon the scene of Old Woo's grief. The young man is moved by the appeal of the Celestial, and plunges into the burning building, rescuing a sacred horn. The simplicity of the Chinaman's gratitude appeals to Alexander and he offers him the position of servant in his home. Woo gladly accepts and goes with them.

On returning to the East, Alexander becomes engaged to Mary Charleson, a widow. Woo becomes attached to Mary's little daughter, Doris, but Mary conceives a dislike for Woo and finally tells Alexander that unless he discharges Woo she will never marry him. Woo leaves, heartbroken, and Mary and Alexander are married. Meanwhile, a Chinese Tong has decided to kidnap Doris and hold her for ransom. They do so and Mary and Alexander are heartbroken. Woo, however, is living in the house in which the Tong rooms are located, and hears Doris crying in another room. Fearing for her, he breaks through the wall and rescues her, but is himself captured by the Tong and taken before their leader. Doris is also again brought before the leader. Woo has recognized the Tong rooms and shows the sacred horn, causing all other members of the Tong to do his bidding. He is allowed to take Doris away with him and returns her to Mary, who then becomes grateful and asks Alexander to take him back into his service.

FRONTIER.

MASQUERADING IN BEAR CANYON (August 7).—Mr. John Brandon, a man of wealth, was told by his family physician that his daughter, Alice, was declining in health, and that he must take her to New Mexico, where the climate might bring her back to health and strength. Alice is secretly betrothed to her father's clerk, and when her father finds this out, it is an added reason why he should try to get his daughter away from the city. The journey is made. Dr. Rice, in Albuquerque, New Mexico, advises a three-weeks' stay in Bear Canyon, a distance of twenty miles from the city. The father, therefore, makes the arrangements. Later they find themselves in the rugged, rocky canyon.

The daughter of a goat herder, himself an invalid, and only a few years earlier compelled to come to the same place for his health, while out with her herd of goats, sees the city girl in her flowing white robe, is startled, goes home and tells her parents. They explain to her that it must be some tourist that has by chance come to this part of the country. The following day she starts out again on her daily jaunt over the hills with the goats. The girls meet and become friends. The city girl decides it would be a fine prank to change clothes with the goat girl and wander off among the rocks with the goats, leaving the goat girl to act the part of the invalid. They decide to keep their secret for fear it might worry Alice's father.

Later, Dr. Seth, the nephew of Dr. Rice, visits his uncle and as Dr. Rice is very busy, the nephew is sent out to Bear Canyon to see how the invalid is getting along. The father wishes to take him up on the hills, but the doctor advises that he can find the patient without disturbing the father. He struggles to the top of the hill, and looking over, sees the goat girl, who he supposes, is Alice, the daughter of Mr. Brandon. The goat girl is very much excited—the doctor very much interested in the beautiful girl. The doctor examines her, and finding that there is nothing wrong with her, comes to the conclusion that there must be a mistake somewhere.

He goes away, but finding it impossible to forget the little girl, comes back the following day, and as the girls have met again and changed clothes, the doctor finds, as he supposes, Alice Brandon. This masquerading is going on for some little time, the doctor becoming more and more infatuated with his supposed patient. The city girl understands the situation, and it has afforded her a lot of enjoyment. Alice's sweetheart is tired of being alone. Later he arrives on the scene, and meeting Dr. Seth, who is just about to start out from Albuquerque to Bear Canyon, is invited by Dr. Seth to ride with him. When the doctor finds that he is the sweetheart of Alice Brandon, he freezes up and is none too courteous. This is all explained away when the two young men reach the summit of the hill in Bear Canyon and find that the girls have been masquerading. Alice's health has been greatly improved and the meeting of her sweetheart makes her supremely happy. The doctor's love was true blue, and the little goat girl finds that he loves her for herself, regardless of her station in life.

ON THE RANGER'S ROLL OF HONOR (August 9).—Often it is the lot of the man who laughs at the little incidents and discouragements of life to be taken for a fool instead of the philosopher that he really is. So it was with Quirl B. Carnes, a ranger of the Texas forces. But Carnes gave his life in the performance of his duty, and for that act, won the respect and admiration of his comrades—too late. All this happened years ago. But Carnes' name today stands as bright in the memory of his fellow rangers as it did on the day they found his bones in the desert. Idealized a little, refined a little, Carnes' story of brave endeavor has become a photoplay.

EXCEPTIONAL OPPORTUNITY,
Care of MOVING PICTURE WORLD,
Box 226, Madison Square P. O., New York City

Senator Carnes, of New York, had a son. At a garden party he gave his old friend, the Governor of Texas, his son proposed to a girl of assured position and great beauty. It chanced that his love had wrought warmth in her heart and she told him the answer would be "yes," when he had made good. As alwaya happens when one wishes to continue the conversation at a dance, an ubiquitous person came just then to take her away for another dance. Thus, bereft of his beloved, Quirl sat thinking of a possible career. As he sat thus thinking, the governor's ranger escort passed the bower where he had proposed. His idea had come. His father's influence, he thought, would secure him a place on the famous Texas ranger force. Application to his father, and later to the governor, showed him he was right in this, and it was arranged that he accompany the executive when he returned to his state. At the ranger station Quirl's readiness to enjoy life as he found it, without question and without great effort, soon made him the butt of the rangers' rough but ready wit. Loyalty to his fiancée made him conceal his hurt feelings from the rangers, but it was to his horse that he turned when he wanted comfort. King and he grew to be great chums.

One day an outlaw was captured and brought into the station by a ranger who was so exhausted that for a time he could go no further. Against his better judgment the captain sent Quirl with the outlaw to turn him over to the county jail. Inexperienced and unsuspecting, Quirl fell a ready prey to the outlaw's crafty plot to escape, but his manhood compelled him to carry the news back to the station as soon as he had recovered his sensibility. The rangers were aroused and pursuit commenced. Again against his better judgment the captain allowed Quirl to form one of the party, the lad having pleaded for a change to redeem himself.

In the fight that followed Quirl alone saw the captured outlaw steal away from the companions whom he had managed to reach and alarm at their camp. He alone pursued them. The bandits hands, manacled at the station had been partly freed by severing the connecting chain with an ax, but still he wore the wristlets. Far into the desert the two fled, the outlaw firing back occasionally but Quirl saving his energies for a closer combat. At last the outlaw's horse was spent with wounds and running and the bad man forced to fight. A lucky shot wounded Quirl's horse so that he fell, but the impassioned boy only found a new use for him as a breastwork to protect him from the outlaw's bullets. Meanwhile his fellow rangers had captured the other outlaws and retraced their steps toward the station. Quirl's trail was lost in the desert but as it was nothing unusual for a ranger to be away for days at a time little was thought of this. A year later the rangers traversing the desert found the skeleton of a man, the wrist bones encirled with the rusted remnants of a pair of handcuffs. A little further on they found the remains of a horse and a man. The human skeleton wore the clothes that had so often caused the rangers to laugh at Quirl, but now they did not laugh. They put Quirl's name on the roll of honor and when his sweetheart and his father came to search for him a little later, pride that Quirl had made good helped to mitigate the sorrow caused by his death. Thus Quirl, the unappreciated, won fame and respect in the end.

THE HONOR OF LADY BEAUMONT (2 parts—August 6).—Lady Beaumont was electrified. Gordon, returning from an inspection of his Canadian properties, assured her that he had seen her former suitor, Sir Dorian Mars, in hiding there. She wanted him. But how? Her solicitor, when summoned, suggested that as business was taking him into Canada, he personally would deliver her message to Sir Dorian. After a hard journey the solicitor found himself in the most primitive of huts, facing a stalwart Englishman, a pretty squaw, and a vivacious child. Sir Dorian, when assured that there was no danger awaiting him in England, admitted his identity. Lady Beaumont's summons "home" swayed his senses like old wine. For a moment he wavered, his squaw and baby gazing at him questioningly. Then he struck a powerful fist on the rude table and shouted: "By God'a grace, listen and see whether you'd respond in my place. Lady Barbara Beaumont, knowing my great love for her, played fast and loose with me from the time we were youth and maid. Her extravagances had her in hot water all the time. My funds were great. I placed them constantly at her disposal, which she accepted because of our expectation of marriage. Bridge was her complete undoing. She'd lose five hundred pounds at a sitting and think nothing of it.

"Barbara met Captain Ferris, unscrupulous, scheming, irresistible, and came under his domination. To further some base plan, he placed Barbara under great obligations by discharging her growing gambling debts. She refused to dismiss me in his favor, and his plan had a new impetus. Barbara got into a very tight place financially and dared not appeal to me. He frightened her into tricking Christie, the pawnbroker. Under his tuition she placed her tiara, on which Christie was to let her have ten thousand pounds, into one box and into the other box she placed coal—black diamonds, Ferris called them—with her seal. By a clever substitution, Christie got the black instead of the real diamonds. Ferris relieved Barbara of the surplus funds, placed them on "Vanity" in the Ascot races, and . . . every cent was lost. He intended forcing her into marriage with him by compromising her honor.

"At a ball given in her honor, Lady Beaumont wore the famous diamond tiara. Ferris had invited Christie. Christie blinked at the circlet of diamonds, bowed suavely to Lady Beaumont, and requested her presence at his office next day. She went, getting word to me first to be on hand, as she might need a friend. Coached by Ferris, she proposed to give Christie a potion in water, exchanging the boxes while he was in a stupor. Christie was old and he sank into a deathlike coma. Barbara fleeing, encountered me and gave me the telltale box. To make my escape, I had to overpower an officer, who attempted to trip me up at the landing where my motorboat was moored. The police-boat followed. It was only by a streak of luck that I was able to elude it. I fled here and was placed on the Royal Mounted Police. Naturige, whom you see here, saved my life at the risk of her own, and nursed me to health when I was sorely wounded. I married her. This is our little 'papoose.' Out in the great world, in England, in London, all is vanity! vanity! But here, Naturige knows no artifice. Her days are a litany, chanted to me, her deity. So, I ask, would you, in my place, be foolish enough to go back?"

Lady Beaumont waited and waited. The peacocks on her lawn preened their iridescent plumes in the sun. Wearily she turned away, blinking brilliant big tears from under hot-lidded eyes.

THROUGH THE TELESCOPE (July 20).—Sancho presumes to love the ranch boss's daughter, Alice. He is fiercely jealous of her accepted lover, Jack, foreman of the ranch, and upbraids her for accepting Jack's attentions. Jack gives him an irrefutable argument with his fist and later in the day discharges the troublesome Greaser.

Jack, on his way from town with the monthly payroll, is held up by the Greaser and a friend, who relieve him of the money and leave him tied helplessly to the back of his horse. Alice, who has been watching through a telescope, sees this and gives the alarm. A thrilling rescue follows. Sancho is pursued and shot, rolling from his horse down a precipice to his death in the river. Wedding bells are inevitable.

SACRED GAZELLES (July 20).—A picturesque feature of dainty Japan is its Sacred Gazelles, which may be seen to best advantage in the vast park of Nara, on the island of Nippon. Adjacent to this is the ancient city of Asivara, which is credited with having been the home of Zinmou, founder of the Japanese monarchy almost three thousand years ago.

Tourists take great pleasure in visiting the gazelles, which are quite tame, and have grown accustomed to begging for the tidbits and delicacies which are always forthcoming. The grace of these lovely creatures can be seen to best advantage when they respond with a rush to the trumpet which summons them to their daily meal.

HE POSES FOR HIS PORTRAIT (Newlywed Series—July 27).—So then we shall have a portrait of boo'ful Snookums. Muvver says he's like dada. Dada says he'a like muvver. Both agree he's the prettiest baby ever and should have a portrait painted. A famous painter is engaged. He is happy to paint their darling, but——

"Come, kitty, kitty, kitty." Snookums doesn't want a picture; he wants to pull its 'ittle tail. Snookuma criea. They are distracted. A wild hunt for the elusive kitten takes place. The famous painter scrambles around under beds and bureaus and finally gets Snookums the kitten, but Snookums gets his goat.

A battle royal between the most wonderful baby and its latest prize, and again a kitten hunt is in order.

Another moment and the doting parents find themselves and their Snookums politely dismissed; next moment the painter collapses in the arms of sympathetic friends and relates the indignities Snookums would heap on his exalted head.

THE THIRD THIEF (July 27).—Margot, a charming flower-girl of the reign of Louis XV, plays puss-in-corner skilfully with the hearts of her many admirers. Lieut. Raoul de Liesienz meets with fair favor; but then there is also the dashing Captain de la Bidoisiere, his uniform, much braided and embroidered; also citizen M. Lassouche has fancied her, and has much gold wherewith to woo her. The captain and Lassouche meet one day over their absinthe, speak of many things, including their fair charmer, become distrustful of each other, and thereafter watch each other and Margot like cat and mouse.

The noble lieutenant, watching his opportunity, acquires the beauty, leaving the other two fellows crestfallen when he marries Margot.

office of Mr. J. Martin, a manufacturing chemist, are rivals for the hand of May, the daughter of the chemist. The two men vie with one another for the favor of the girl, and very discreetly she shows no favoritism.

Will resorts to intrigue to disgrace Bob by robbing the safe and leaving a bit of evidence that will implicate Bob. The plot works very well until in his anxiety to gain supremacy, Will unwittingly discloses evidence that would prove an alibi for Bob. May has never doubted the integrity of Bob, and quickly appreciates the value of the evidence. But she is forcibly locked in the chemist laboratory at the Martin home. Her knowledge of chemistry enables her to prepare a charge of nitro-glycerine, with which she blows open the door.

The evidence, a photograph of Bob drinking at a pond, is taken to the courtroom where Bob's trial is under way. This proves his innocence and the case is dismissed. Will leaves for parts unknown and Bob and May prosper in their love for each other.

GOLDEN GATE PARK AND ENVIRONS (August 7).—California, the mecca for tourists the year round, encompasses a greater number of gorgeous natural beauties than any other like area throughout the world. Specimens of animal and vegetable life predominate and furnish a satiating repast for the eye and mind to feast upon. California's great charms are recognized throughout the traveled world.

San Francisco can be safely termed one of the most spectacular cities of the United States. This city is a veritable reservoir of dynamic energy that finds an outlet in the hale and hearty endeavor that predominates in civic, social and political activities. The Golden Gate is a historical phenomenon with its gateway a mile in width, that the beauty of the spectacle at once impresses itself indelibly upon the mind of the observer.

HIS SISTER LUCIA (August 9).—Antonio and Lucia arrive from Italy on their first trip to America, having left their native country upon the death of their mother, who charged Antonio with the care of his sister, Lucia. Everything appears very strange to them as they walk up the busy street seeking lodgings. They find quarters and after seeing that his sister has every comfort that he is able to provide out of his fast diminishing savings, Antonio starts out to find work, which he did, and was soon at work with a construction gang on a new street railway.

One day a very well dressed lady, in trying to cross the tracks, stepped directly in front of a passing automobile. Antonio jumped to the woman's side, and catching hold of her just in the nick of time, effected a very thrilling rescue. The lady gave Antonio her card, asking him to call. That evening Antonio and his sister seek the address on the card, and upon entering the beautiful garden, find the lady sitting on the lawn. Antonio presents the card and introduces his sister, after which they are shown about the grounds, with which they both become enraptured.

As they were about to leave, the lady asked Antonio if he would care for the job of gardener. Antonio did not reply immediately, but looked for a moment at his sister. The lady, noting the look of affection between them, quickly surmised the truth that Antonio loved his sister so much that he wanted to be near her, if possible, whereupon he was told that his sister should come also and and be his housekeeper in the little home provided for them on the grounds. After getting located in their new place, Lucia one day walking through the garden, encounters their benefactress' son, he having no particular aim in life but to find the right girl and settle down. He had had all of the conventional society that he cared for and was only waiting for the spark that would start the heart-flame going. For the moment he looked at Lucia and then, seeing her only as one of the many girls that he had met, he spoke and passed on. Later they met again. This time he tries to force his attentions, but at that moment Antonio, coming through the garden, sees this and thinking the intentions of the man wrong, rushes at him drawing his stilleto and is about to attack, when Lucia quickly throws herself between the man and Antonio, staying the stilleto.

Antonio pauses a moment, and finds that they really love each other. Antonio smiled, takes his sister in his arms and kisses her approvingly. He then places her hand in Tom's. Tom and Lucia quickly seek the mother, and on finding her, Tom tells her that he "has found the right girl." Whereupon his mother, removing her own wedding ring, places it upon Lucia's finger. Antonio, watching this from the distance, walks slowly behind a rose bush and kneeling down, he drew the stilleto again and with it, digs a hole in the ground, burying the dagger forever.

THE HOUSE OF BONDAGE (2 parts—Aug. 8).—Aaron Alden, a Plymouth fisherman, lives alone with his daughter, Hope. In a terrific storm Alden is hurled from a mast, where he has gone to furl a sail, to the deck, and receives fatal injuries. Before dying he dictates a letter to his friend, John Cabot, asking him to take care of Hope. Cabot and his wife, Prudence, take the girl into their home and make a household drudge of her, treating her like a slave. Cabot's son, Nathan, returns from England and falls in love with Hope. He tries to protect her and better her condition, without avail. One day Hope breaks a dish accidentally and Cabot beats her. Her cries attract Nathan, who rushes into the house. A stormy scene takes place, and Hope is ordered to leave. Nathan stands loyally by her, and tells his father he will go away with Hope. Cabot, enraged, commands them both to leave. They are married and are very happy when Nathan is taken sick, and is in a delirious fever. Hope fears he will die and calls on Cabot, pleading with him to come and see Nathan, but Cabot drives her away.

Nathan recovers, and Cabot decides to accuse Hope of witchcraft. He writes himself a note, which he pins to the door, and then secretes an image stuck full of pins under the steps of Hope's home. When the note is found he makes the accusation and the home of Hope is searched and her supposed tools of witchcraft discovered. She is roughly treated by the mob. Nathan tries to protect her, but is hurled aside.

Hope is placed in jail to await trial. One of the villagers suddenly meets a redskin in the woods, and, panic-stricken, shoots him. The Indian is badly hurt, and is carried away by his companions. They decide to attack the village in revenge. That night Nathan removes the bars from the window of Hope's jail and the two dash into the woods. They discover the Indians quietly approaching, and rush back and give the alarm. A terrific battle takes place, and the ammunition of the settlers finally becomes exhausted. Cabot has a keg of powder in his cabin, but none dares endeavor to get it. Hope, unseen by the excited people, goes out through the cellar door and manages to secure the powder. While returning she is shot by an Indian, and Nathan rushes to her rescue, engaging in a hand-to-hand fight with two Indians, whom he kills. He then carries Hope back to the block-house, where she expires. Conscience-stricken, Cabot pleads for her forgiveness, which she grants before passing away.

The supply of powder enables the settlers to drive the redskins away. Hope is buried, and a pathetic scene takes place as Nathan throws himself upon the mound, in a paroxysm of grief.

BRONCHO.

A WARTIME MOTHER'S SACRIFICE (2 parts—July 30).—In the spring of 1861 Carter, of the United States Secret Service, is in Centerville, Va., and makes the acquaintance of Lieut. Taylor, a son of Col. Taylor, of the Southern army. Carter is posing as a civilian, accompanied by a fellow spy, Edwards, and hopes to trap Taylor into revealing information of value. To this end Carter gets Taylor drunk and inveigles him into a card game. By a pre-arranged plan with Edwards, a revolver is loaded with blanks, and when Edwards cheats and is called to account by Taylor, the latter curses him and goads him to intense fury, and he snatches up the pistol—which has been laid on the table for the purpose—and shoots at Edwards, who drops and feigns death. The shot attracts a crowd, who rush into Carter's room—where the three have been playing—and Carter hides the supposed corpse of Edwards, pushes Taylor into a closet and tells the people he has accidentally discharged the pistol while cleaning it. He then poses as Taylor's good friend and promises to get him out of the scrape and to conceal the death of Edwards. Edwards leaves for the north, under cover of the night, and the next day Carter shows Taylor the supposed grave of Edwards, hidden under heavy bushes.

Carter secures an introduction to Taylor's sister, Ardath, and pays her considerable attention. A big battle is impending, the opposing forces coming nearer and nearer to each other. Carter boldly tells Edwards that he is a Federal spy, and threatens to expose him as a murderer unless he secures for Carter the Confederate plans of battle. A big scene takes place, and finally Dick Taylor breaks down and promises to comply with Carter's demands. The next day the battle begins. Col. Taylor—Dick's father—is seen in conference with General Beauregard and his staff.

Ardath becomes suspicious of Carter and follows him. She tells the Confederate officers her suspicions, and they capture Carter and find a message from Dick, unsigned. They tell Carter his life will be spared if he reveals the writer of the note. Col. Taylor is most insistent to discover the identity of the traitor, and Carter tells him it is Taylor's own son. Taylor flies into a rage, and is prevented from killing Carter on the spot by brother officers. Taylor and a squad of men go to the spot Carter has designated as the meeting-place with Dick, and he, panic-stricken, leaps on his horse and galops away. The squad follows him, and he is shot from his horse—the most sensational fall ever seen in pictures—and makes his way home, where he is tenderly cared for by Ardath and his mother. The Colonel and his men follow the trail of blood, and reach the house as Dick has made a complete confession to his mother. She carries him away, and denies having seen him when the Colonel enters. Fearing capture, Dick shoots himself. A messenger comes on a mad gallop with a message from Gen. Beauregard to the Colonel, requiring his presence, and he goes away, as the enemy has begun to advance.

Carter makes a sensational escape from prison, shooting down the guards. Rushing into the battle, he leaps on a riderless horse and makes his escape through a hail of bullets.

The battle has raged furiously and mounds of men—North and South—have fallen together, locked in deadly embrace. Mrs. Taylor, Ardath and a few faithful negroes carry the body of Dick to one of those mounds, and that night, after the battle has subsided, Dick is found with the Confederate flag in one hand and a pistol in the other, with a half dozen Union soldiers lying dead about him—indisputable evidence of the way he met his death. The Colonel is notified and goes with a lantern to look at Dick, and as he gazes at the scene renewed confidence comes into his heart as he damns Carter as a liar, and the expression on his face shows the pride and grief which he feels.

JOE HIBBARD'S CLAIM (August 6).—Joe Hibbard is employed in a mine and systematically steals gold nuggets until he has quite a fortune hoarded away in his cabin. He writes his old mother the following letter:

"Rocky Gulch, Cal.,
"May 1, 1853.

"Dear Mother—Am operating a very paying claim out here. Take train and stage for California immediately. Will meet you upon arrival.

"Your affectionate son, Joe."

The foreman sees Joe concealing a nugget, and that evening follows him home and watches through the window while Joe places it with the rest of his stealings. An hour later the sheriff, acting upon the foreman's accusation, prepares to arrest Joe. A desperate fight takes place, in which the sheriff is mortally wounded, and Joe makes his escape on horseback, eluding the posse which goes after him.

A fugitive from justice, Joe becomes bitter and decides to become a bandit and holds up the stage coach. Among the letters he secures is one addressed to himself, from his mother, reading:

"My Dear Son—I am leaving for the West next week. Meet me at Rocky Gulch either Tuesday or Thursday stage of week following. Am glad to hear that you are doing so well. Until I see you again, believe me,

"Your devoted mother,
"Mary Hibbard."

Joe realizes what he has done, and is heartbroken. He camps for the night, and in the early morning the posse surrounds him. Knowing that quick death will be his fate if captured, Joe sells his life dearly, but is finally captured by a clever lariat throw. He pleads with the men not to disclose to his mother the manner of his death, and they agree to shield the woman from the knowledge of her son's crimes.

Mrs. Hibbard arrives and is treated with the utmost kindness by the miners. The settlement doctor is chosen to break the news to her, and he gently tells her that Joe met his death in an accident at the mine. She is grief stricken, and is in a pitiable plight, as her funds have been entirely exhausted by the journey. The boys secretly make a collection and lay a considerable amount in her hands, telling her it was left by Joe. Then she is led to the newly made grave, over which a rude tombstone announces the name and date of the death of Joe Hibbard, and the broken-hearted old woman is left to sorrow over her child.

RELIANCE.

BELOW THE DEAD LINE (July 28).—Mike Grogan, a crook, sends his daughter, Rose, to a fashionable reception with orders for her to ply her trade and get away with the guests' jewelry. Joe Emerson, a reporter on the "Chronicle," is sent by the city editor to cover the affair and give it a big write-up. At the reception, Mrs. Vandermade exhibits her new necklace and has trouble in getting it refastened. Rose offers her help and when Mrs. Vandermade sits with her escort in the conservatory. Rose steals behind the palms and takes the insecurely fastened necklace without detection, except by Joe, who standing out of sight, is taking notes for the paper. Joe confronts her before she has concealed the necklace and bars her escape. The necklace is missed and detectives are asked to search the guests, as all have made known their willingness. Seeing that Rose will be caught, Joe takes the necklace from her and returns it, the affair being dismissed. Rose hurries out but Joe meets her and escorting her home, secures her promise to reform. Rose tell her father of her decision. Spike, her brother, overhears and attempts to strike her but is prevented by Nelson, Grogan's partner, who is in love with Rose. Later, Joe finds her a boarding house and calls to escort her to it. Nelson has dissolved partnership with Grogan and as he has been cheated, sneaks into the house and shoots him. Joe sees him dash out, and picking up the fallen revolver, he hurries inside only to find Grogan dead. An officer hearing the shot, breaks in and finding Joe beside the dead man and with the gun in his hand, arrests him. At the trial Joe is found guilty and sent to prison. He declares his love for Rose and asks her to wait for him. Rose decides to save Joe and by a trick secures Nelson's confession to the crime. Joe is released and the lovers are reunited.

ROSITA'S CROSS OF GOLD (July 30).—Rosita and Tony, brother and sister, are employees of Freedman's sweatshop. Rosita's sweetheart, Pedro, works across the way. Pedro presents her with a cross of gold on her birthday. Freedman is attracted by the beauty of the Italian girl, and one day while she is in the private office, tries to force his embraces on her. She struggles and cries for help, the cross breaking from its chain and falling to the floor. Pedro and Tony come to her rescue and it looks bad for Freedman when he is rescued by the police. The men leave, vowing vengeance. That night, they both plan to return and kill Freedman, but Rosita temporarily thwarts their efforts. Later, each unknown to the other, goes to Freedman's office to kill him. In the meantime, a thief has climbed a fire escape and after a struggle, Freedman is killed. The thief picks up the glistening cross and is about to rifle the place, when he hears a noise and escapes via a door. The noise is made by Tony ascending the fire escape. When he sees the body he thinks Pedro is the murderer. Pedro, meanwhile comes up in time to see Tony fleeing and thinks the latter has committed the murder. Next morning, the body is found and when the employees tell of the incident of the previous day, the police go in search of the two men. Each remains dumb, one thinking the other guilty, and are arrested. The thief takes the cross to a pawnshop and there meets Rosita, who has come there to sell a few trinkets to raise money to defend the men. She recognizes the cross, follows the man and then notifies the police of his whereabouts and he is captured. Tony and Pedro are freed upon the thief's confession. They are amazed to learn that neither committed the crime.

THE LITTLE PIRATE (August 2).—The Westons live near the seashore. Bobby is a great favorite with his grandfather. After the old man reads a pirate story to the boy, Bobby dresses as a pirate, and with wooden sword, black mask, etc., asks grandpa to play pirate with him. They go down the beach. They get into a boat and have great fun. After a time, they both fall asleep. The boat, having become unfastened, drifts out with the tide. The father of the boy becomes alarmed at their long absence and goes out in search of them. He finds Bobby's hat washed up by the breakers. The boat is missed and the father goes to Capt. Burton, who owns a motorboat, and they set out to find the missing couple. Meantime, Bobby and Grandpa have landed on an island, which the boy calls his treasure island. The old man sees, to his dismay, that the boat has drifted away and that the tide is coming in fast. He lifts the boy high in his arms with the help of a plank. Mr. Weston and Burton are speeding fast in the motorboat. Finally they sight the rowboat. It is empty. They are in despair. The tide is rising all around grandpa. He decides to tie Bobby to a plank, so that he may be saved. When all hope is gone, he pushes him out to sea. The motorboat sees the child and he is picked up. He urges them so save grandpa and they arrive just in time. The boy is carried to his frantic mother. That night grandpa tells Bobby, "we'll cut out this pirate business after this."

The schoolmaster sends all the children to the beach to bathe or paddle, as their wishes dictate. He strolls around the town and finally wanders to the beach, where he is trapped by the watching Buddy, and the result is that his scholastic costume is soaked. He goes to a bathing house, but can only get a woman's bathing dress of ample proportions. There is nothing else to do, so he dons it and again joins the pupils. He bathes and then seeks a nice quiet spot in which to snooze. He wants to forget the indignity thrust upon him by Buddy, who has dived under water and made him think that a crab has his toe.

He sleeps and the boys fly a kite until the cord gives out—happy thought! Buddy ties a strand from the master's sweater and the kite sails higher and the sweater gradually disappears before the unravelling process.

He wakes and goes and changes his clothes. The boys have sports, and a tug of war is suggested by the master. He is caught in the rope and again gets a good soaking, and decides that it is time to go home—the fun is too exciting for an everyday schoolmaster.

THE TOY (July 29).—Jim Sloan has been out of work for some time; his wife is ill in bed. One day he takes his child to the park, and there they see the children of rich families playing. Baby Sloan spies a little toy dog on the bench which she and her father occupy. She picks it up and begins playing with it. The father is reading a piece of newspaper and doesn't notice. Presently one of the little girls sees Baby Sloan with her toy, runs over and snatches it from her hand. Baby Sloan cries, the nurse runs up and takes away the rich child, looking scornfully back. Sloan tries to pacify the baby but it's no use and they go home. Arriving home the mother sees the baby has been crying and asks the reason. The father explains.

The next day sees the father, mother and child in the room. The child is trying to fashion a doll from some old rags, finally despairs, throws the rag doll away and cries. The father, desperate, goes out; he is determined to get a toy of some kind for his child. Walking along the street he passes a toy shop. He goes in, and when no one is looking, takes a doll from the counter and goes out, but one of the customers, who saw him take the doll, tells the proprietor, who rushes out, calls a policeman, and follows Sloan. He is arrested and sentenced to ninety days in the work-house. Owing to his ill health he is put to work in the garden, which is surrounded by a high fence. His wife and child visit him and he hands them vegetables. A keeper sees him and reports him to the warden, before whom he is summoned. The warden is harsh at first, but when Sloan tells him that he did it to save his little family from starvation, he softens, secretly determining to bring the matter before the judge. He does so, and amid great rejoicing, Sloan is set free and the court attaches contribute liberally.

TEMPESTA (August 2).—Tempesta is an Italian, an agitator and reformer. He preaches liberty, fraternity and equality—down with monarchy! He is arrested and thrown into prison. He knows the American Consul, who comes to him, and Tempesta gives his wife and child into his keeping. The consul loves the child and freely agrees. Aided by a friendly guard, Tempesta escapes and stows away on a vessel bound for America.

His wife dies and the consul adopts the child and loves her dearly. Eighteen years pass and Angele is grown to womanhood. The consul has retired from public life and lives in New York. Angela thinks he is her father, and she is engaged to a promising artist. One day while walking in the Ghetto, Hooper sees Tempesta and persuades him to come to the studio and pose as a brigand for him. Angela and the consul visit the studio and Tempesta recognizes his daughter from her likeness to her sainted mother, and also from his easy recognition of the consul.

Angela and the artist stroll to the garden and Tempesta makes himself known to the consul, who is shocked at again meeting the man he thought dead. Tempesta desires to make himself known to his daughter, but the consul alternately pleads and reasons with him, and finally persuades him that he has nothing to give her—nothing to offer—neither position, place nor money. Why disillusion her? Why crumble her dreams and ambitions, why interfere with the perfect love existing between the girl and her supposed father. Tempesta is touched; he agrees not to make himself known, and refusing financial assistance, he brushes away the tears that scorch his cheeks and goes sadly away.

THANHOUSER.

WILLIE THE WILD MAN (July 27).—He was the son of a prominent financier, but was a bad poker player. His repeated requests for funds exasperated his father, and the latter finally cut off his allowance. The young man found himself stranded at a summer hotel without money and threatened with eviction by the hard-hearted landlord.

The chief attraction of the hotel was a wonderful wild man, who lived in a cave in the nearby mountains. People flocked from distant points to see the wonderful being, and, incidentally, stopped at the hotel. The wild man tired of his lonely life and resigned his position. The question of a successor was a perplexing one to the hotel owner, until he thought of his delinquent guest. The idea of prancing around the mountains in scant attire did not appeal to the young man, but the hotel owner finally induced him to take the post. He was a very satisfactory wild man, and far excelled his predecessor.

A millionaire came to the hotel with his pretty daughter. The girl took a walk through the mountains and there encountered the wild man. Unlike many others, she did not flee, but faced him fearlessly. The wild man was so anxious to gain her good opinion that he told her who he really was, and she found that her brother was his intimate friend.

On his day off, the wild man, once more handsome and well dressed, called at the hotel. Acquaintanceship soon ripened into love, but the girl's father refused his consent. However, a few days later, when passing through the mountains, he was captured by the terrible wild man, who bound him to a tree and then disappeared. A few minutes later the young man whom he had refused to consider as a son-in-law appeared, released him from his perilous plight and escorted him to safety.

The millionaire often tells how his son-in-law rescued him at the risk of his own life.

"The boy was inclined to be extravagant," he says, "and that was why his father stopped his allowance, but as soon as he heard how he saved me from that ferocious wild man, he realized that there was something to the boy after all. That's why my son-in-law is partner in his father's banking house.

LITTLE DORRIT (July 29).—Little Dorrit was born in the Marshalsea prison in London, where debtors were confined years ago. Her father had numerous creditors whose claims had to be satisfied before he could leave the prison's gloomy walls. Her mother died when the child was eight years old, and the girl lived in the Marshalsea with her brother and sister. She was devoted to her family and helped them in many ways. Through her efforts, a dancing master, temporarily imprisoned in the Marshalsea, instructed her sister, Fanny, in the art of dancing. A seamstress taught Little Dorrit how to sew, and the girl, in her new occupation, earned money to buy luxuries for her helpless family.

Little Dorrit frequently did sewing for Mrs. Clenman, an elderly widow, and at her home met her son, Arthur, who had just returned from a trip abroad. The young man was strongly attracted by the quiet, self-sacrificing girl, and a strong attachment sprung up between them, but Little Dorrit was loyal to her family, whom she felt was dependent upon her. Arthur Clennam bent every effort to secure the release of Dorrit from the Marshalsea, and succeeded in proving the latter's right to a fortune left by a distant relative. The Dorrits, now rich, ignored Arthur, to whom they owed everything, that is, all except Little Dorrit, but her family forced her to go with them to Italy, and become a society personage like themselves.

Wealth did not bring happiness to the Dorrits. Little Dorrit was as unaffected as ever, but her family was pursebound and arrogant. The father was stricken at a banquet and died soon after, believing that he was once more a prisoner in the Marshalsea. Little Dorrit, now free, received word that Arthur Clennam had lost his fortune and was a prisoner himself in the Marshalsea. She went to him and comforted him in his hour of trial. Fortune smiled upon them, and Arthur soon was able to pay his debts and leave the Marshalsea forever, with his bride, Little Dorrit, the child of the Marshalsea.

IN THE NICK OF TIME (August 1).—It often happens that very loving wives are also very jealous of the objects of their affections. A young salesman in a dry goods house often heard this statement made, but laughed it to scorn. His wife was devoted to him and to their little daughter, and as far as jealousy was concerned, why, she was incapable of so base an impulse.

His opinion was put to the test. The head of his firm detailed him to entertain a lady buyer from an out-of-town concern. He took the customer to the theater, and to dinner at a high-priced restaurant. His wife happened to see him with the woman, at once arrived at the wrong conclusion, and was jealous. When the salesman arrived home there was a quarrel. The wife would listen to no explanations, the husband was hotheaded, and the result was that he took his belongings and left his home at once. The wife was well provided for, and she had the companionship of her child. The husband had a comfortable boarding place. But they were both unhappy, for they really cared for each other, and pride alone prevented them from making up their differences. Then fate took a hand in the problem. The wife called upon a neighbor in an adjoining flat, and during her absence her little daughter turned the valve in the gas log. The door leading to the flat snapped shut when the mother crossed the hall and she had forgotten her key. When she discovered her child's peril she called frantically for help, and the appeal was answered by her husband. Exerting all his strength he smashed the door from its hinges and rushed into the flat just in time to save his child's life. The child's peril proved to be a blessing in disguise for it was the means of bringing the little family together again.

EXCLUSIVE FILM CORPORATION

GAUMONT.

"PALMISTRY" (July 22).—This film is a distinct novelty, and, in a manner which is interesting throughout, the pictures give the story of Palmistry from its earliest beginnings, showing how it originated in India, when certain priests tried to interpret Fate from the markings on the palm. Later these Palmist Priests were driven from their temples and took refuge in Egypt where they formed wandering tribes afterwards called Gypsies (from 'Egyptians") who read hands and predicted the future.

A very ingenious arrangement is shown by which hands may be read, a model being exhibited in conjunction with a photographed hand, lines tracing themselves out on the former which indicate the various stages in a man's life. Different types of hands are included—hands with square fingers indicate method, discipline, common-sense; certain types of pointed fingers indicate imagination, poetry, frivolty; and several other types are given together with full explanation in each case. All the the lines of the hand are examined in turn, and the film ends with a representation of a lucky hand.

"WHEN THE CARDS WERE SHUFFLED" (July 24).—Young Baron Beljambe drops into a Paris restaurant for a light lunch, and meets John Dupont, his old friend. Dupont, a newlywed, will not stay with him as he is in a hurry to get home, but leaves his card so that the Baron may call upon him at a future date. Enter a wealthy American, Cornelius K. Dowd, accompanied by his charming daughter, Amelia, and Beljambe's disappointment at Dupont's desertion vanishes in a second. It does not take so skilled a boulevardier long to exchange glances with Amelia, and he passes her Dupont's card upon which he has written a request for an appointment. Papa is, however, not so blind as he seems, and before his daughter can reach the card Papa has seized it. A hot altercation follows, and Papa Dowd flings his glove in the Baron's face.

Next day two strange gentlemen call upon Mr. Dupont—Mr. Dowd's seconds have come to arrange the duel. Dupont loses his temper over their persistency, finally decorating one with a black eye and allowing the other to escape with an upper-cut. The noise draws Mrs. Dupont to the scene; she learns the alleged reason, believes the story, and promptly rushes off to mother. Dupont dashing after her meets the Baron on the doorstep, explains where he is going, and engages another taxi. Beljambe, knowing what is wrong, charters yet a third taxi, and joins in the chase. Further down the street Mr. Dowd sees the Baron in his taxi, and believing he is attempting a get-away, the American makes a fourth in the swiftly gliding fleet of taxi's. The procession eventually reaches the house of Dupont's mother-in-law, the young wife commences to sob out her story of infidelity, when the crowd of followers rushes in pell-mell. The Baron sees that he must explain matters or there will be a riot, so he makes a clean breast of it, whereupon Dowd tickled by the humor of the situation, laughingly relents upon hearing the true facts of the case.

"THROUGH MOUNTAINS MAJESTIC" July 24).—This is yet another of the masterpieces of scenic subjects turned out by the house of Gaumont, giving us a magnificent panorama of some of the most beautiful mountainous districts of Europe, in what might be termed a "personally conducted" manner.

WITH HONOR AT STAKE (2 parts—July 15).—Mrs. D'Arcy W. Martin's adoring husband learns that his wife is suffering from heart trouble and the doctor advises that she avoid all excitement. At the Horton's reception in Paris, Mrs. Martin unexpectedly meets George Molyneaux, a sweetheart of youthful days, for whom she yet retains a lingering affection. Molyneaux is the possessor of a packet of Mrs. Martin's early love-letters, and she asks him to return them. He writes her a note expressing his willingness to hand her back these compromising missives, but asks that she will, just for the final good-bye, come in person to receive them. Mrs. Martin, knowing his honorable nature, agrees to do this, and we see her in George's house. He goes to fetch the letters from a box, but hearing a sharp cry of pain, rushes back to her, only to find Mrs. Martin quite prostrate. Molyneaux is terrified, he thinks Madeline is dead, and his only thought is now to find some means whereby the honor of the woman he loves can be sustained. The hours drag on, Molyneaux's only recourse is to lovingly and tenderly inter the body in a leafy sepulchre in the nearby woods. He slaves for hours at the making of a grave.

Meanwhile Mrs. Martin's husband has become alarmed at her long absence, and when he hears from the Police Commissioner that his wife's handbag has been discovered on the person of a thief, he jumps to the worst conclusion, and accuses the alleged thief of killing his wife for purposes of robbery. When Molyneaux gets back to the house, he is overjoyed to find the woman whom he thought dead has returned to life, and had suffered nothing but a sudden heart attack. Mrs. Martin examines her watch and finding how late the hour is, hurries off home to her distracted husband and much prized baby. Mr. Martin is in the seventh heaven of delight to see his wife alive and well, and promptly telephones for the release of the suspect, while Mrs. Martin allays all suspicion by informing her husband that while taking a walk in the woods she was suddenly seized with a heart attack, which excuse amply accounts for her long absence.

A TROMBONE MARATHON (July 10).—Aesop's fable of the frog who tried to swell himself to the dimensions of a bull is about the only parallel which comes to mind when viewing the efforts of Max, sole trombonist at the Grand Theater. Max has seen tidings of a strange bequest: $25,000 is awaiting the musician who can play "The Maiden's Prayer" for twenty-four hours without stopping, and Max resolves to win that bequest.

Kiki, his sweetheart, urges him on to win the prize as otherwise her obdurate guardian will not entertain him as a suitor for Kiki's hand. "Win or burst," and he goes to it with a will and vim. What twenty-four hours of continuous tromboning can produce can be much better seen than described in language. Max, with protruding eyes and distended cheeks makes a funny sight indeed; more than once he is literally at the last gasp, but love supports him until twenty-three hours and fifty-nine minutes have elapsed—at which point the neighbors rush in with murderous intentions. The lawyer waked from the stupor which the soloist's unending blast has brought about, and when it is known that Max, now limply hanging about his fiancee's neck, has won the coveted $25,000, the applause is just deafening.

GREAT NORTHERN.

A COUNTRY COUSIN (July 19).—Jack and a party of his chums are enjoying luncheon in a quiet summer resort not far distant from a young ladies' seminary. In a spirit of fun, a wager is made, and Jack departs with the avowed purpose of gaining entrance to the seminary under the pretext that he is the country cousin of one of the fair students. During the temporary absence of the stern principal, Jack manages to explain the nature of his wager to the students and they at once enter the spirit of the fun. Jack is clad in female attire and all goes well until the principal returns. She is introduced to Jack as a country cousin, but Jack is unaccustomed to the wearing of corsets and skirts, and makes several serious blunders in trying to act his chosen role. Everyone is in the secret but the stern maiden lady who presides over the destinies of the school. The blunders of Jack become so numerous, however, that the principal cannot help but notice that he is wearing trousers under his gaudy skirt. Then it is that he beats a hasty retreat and rejoins his friends, still clad in female garb, and tells the humorous story of his adventure.

THE HEAVENLY WIDOW (August 6).—Billy and Angella are lovers. Billy introduces his friend, Jack, to Angella, and Angella falls in love with Jack and neglects Billy. To get even, Billy poses as a dashing widow at Jack's boarding house. Jack flirts with the fake widow and takes strolls in the park with her. Then Billy, the fake widow, sends a note to Angella, which reads:

"Jack is deceiving you. If you want to prove it, conceal yourself behind the big elm in the park immediately. A. FRIEND."

Angella receives the note and goes to the park to spy on Jack. She gets behind the big elm and sees Jack and the widow on the bench making love. Jack tries to kiss the widow. Angella comes forward, denounces him, and returns his ring. The fake widow gets tickled and starts snickering, which enrages Angella, and she starts a hair-pulling match with the widow. After she has mussed the widow up good, she accidentally pulls off the widow's wig, discovers Billy; then she regrets the way she has treated Billy, and she hints that Billy can take her back again, which he does.

FALSELY ACCUSED (August 8).—Helen Walter, a rich and fickle girl, is in love with her cousin, Jack King. He does not in any way return her affection, being very fond of Miss Brown, the pretty little seamstress, who comes daily to the Walter home. Jack spends much time with Miss Brown, reading or talking to her while she sews. Helen notices the attention her cousin shows the seamstress, and is very jealous. She finally hits upon a plan whereby she can get Miss Brown out of the way.

Jack is proposing to the little seamstress when Alice enters the room with Miss Brown's coat, in which she says she found her jewels. Miss Brown denies the accusation, but Alice calls in the police and she is arrested. Jack is very much shocked at the occurrence, but feels sure that his sweetheart is innocent. He therefore goes to a detective and explains the matter to him. The detective takes him to a hypnotist, who, by his hypnotic power, to which Alice is susceptible, makes her confess. Jack meets Miss Brown at the prison gate after she is released, and they lose no time in finding a minister.

LOYAL HEARTS (July 31).—Nell Canby, a young Western girl with a fondness for painting, has an inseparable companion in her horse, Bob. Engrossed in her art, Nell dreams of going to New York in order to further her studies. At this junction a young ranchman falls in love with her, and she promises to become his wife on the condition that she first completes her education in the big city. Her father objects to her going, but his old partner persuades him to let the girl go.

Nell takes her horse with her to New York, and is progressing finely with her studies. The young ranchman starts on a long trip with a herd of cattle, and in the meantime Nell's father is taken ill and dies. Owing to unfortunate speculations he has lost all, and Nell in New York hears the sad news of her bereavement and unfortunate financial condition. She bravely makes up her mind to support herself by her art, and economizes by securing cheaper lodgings. She is unable to pay for her horse's keep, and the liveryman threatens to sell Bob. Nell tries to dispose of some of her paintings in order to pay her bills, but finds no market. The liveryman sells her horse to a junkman, and Bob is badly treated. The young ranchman has returned from his long trip and starts for New York in search of his sweetheart. He comes across Bob being ill treated by the junkman and recognizes the horse. He has endeavored to trace Nell, but without avail. He buys the horse, cures for him, and Bob again becomes the horse he was in the days Nell petted him. While riding along Riverside Drive, he meets Nell in a forlorn condition. The sweethearts and their pet return to the West.

FOR THE MAN SHE LOVED (2 parts—July 16).—The Progressive Bridge Construction Company's finances were at their lowest ebb, when word was received that it had been offered the $750,000 contract to build the proposed city bridge. In celebration of this fact, Alvin Young, secretary of the company, gave a garden party at his summer home, at which he invited his entire office force. Seeing an opportune moment, he proposed to and was accepted by Ellen Glyn, his private stenographer, much to the discomfiture of Dave Harding, the general manager of the company, also in love with Ellen.

Thinking that he could retrieve the company's fallen finances, Young made a "safe" speculation, unknown to the other members of the firm, but failed to destroy the incriminating carbon copy, which was later found by Harding, who, upon bringing it to the attention of the Board of Directors, has Young arrested. Ellen, although greatly perturbed over the turn of events, becomes vengeful when she is informed by Harding that he had Young arrested to further his suit.

Carrying out her plan of having Harding spend lavishly, she has him purchase for her an automobile, a motorboat, costly jewels, has him take her to wine suppers, theaters, etc., and all the time she is having him believe that she really loves him, when, in reality, she is only doing this to get "square" with him for having been instrumental in placing her affianced husband in jail. To cap the climax she asks him for a necklace valued at $42,000. He is startled at her request, but consents to get it for her. His account having dwindled away, he that night decides to rob his company's safe. But just as he is about to get away with the bonds he is apprehended by detectives brought by Ellen, who had followed him. He is arrested, and Ellen, speaking before the Board of Directors, makes restitution for Harding's successive thefts by giving them all the expensive presents he had given her. These gifts helped to offset the defalcations materially, and when they offered her a responsible position, Ellen broke down and told of Harding's treachery. She then showed them a clipping, telling of Young's illness at a hospital since he had been pardoned. Her request that Young be reinstated was granted, and together with a member of the Board, she went to the bedside of Young and showed him the official notification of his reinstatement.

TRAPPED IN THE DEATH PIT (3 parts—feature release).—The private stenographer of Mr. Desroget, apprised Marx, a thief, that her employer was sending to Hanney's Bank, in South America, four million dollars in bullion, and that it was on board the steamer "Annam." Marx, who had a slight acquaintance with the captain, managed to get a position aboard the ship as storekeeper. He was successful in throwing one crate of bullion overboard, and was just about to throw another one into the water, when he was disturbed by Lafarge, a steward, who was showing Mrs. Desroget and her maid, Suzette)the sweetheart of Lafarge), around the ship. Lafarge left the women and went in the direction of the noise. He had scarcely discovered the disappearance of one crate of bullion, when the ship was shaken from bow to stern by an explosion, caused by Marx, who had thrown his lantern among some explosives stored in the hull. He went in search of the women, but was unable to find them. At length they were discovered in the storeroom, but each sailor who descended into the fiery inferno was dragged out unconscious. It was with the greatest of difficulty that the captain was able to restrain Mr. Desroget from going after his wife. Lafarge, having recovered from the smoke, fought his way through the mass of fallen debris, and in answer to his call of "Suzette! Suzette!" he received a faint cry. Heading in the direction of the sound, he found the unconscious women. Regaining consciousness for a moment, Suzette pleaded that he first bring her mistress to safety, which he did. Suzette was rescued by the sailors.

When a semblance of order had been restored the captain made an investigation. As the missing crate of bullion could not have been carried down the gangplank, he conceived the idea that it had been thrown overboard. He sent for an expert diver and Martin, the man who had been employed by Marx to carry away the bullion, responded to the call. At the bottom of the river he discovered the bullion, the basket in which Marx had intended to carry away the bullion, getting little by little after successive dives, and Marx himself, who had become a victim of his own greed.

KINETO.

AT THE FOOT OF THE SCAFFOLD (2 parts—Feature Release).—John West, an ambitious young fellow, takes leave of his mother and sister to fight his way to fame and fortune in London. He meets his new employer with boyish frankness and eagerly settles down to his new life. Weeks pass, and each night the postman takes a letter to the dear old home, telling of his steady progress. While taking his supper one evening, he remembers that his beloved mother's birthday is fast approaching. He must buy her a useful present with his first earned savings, so on the morrow, he quickly makes tracks for an old curiosity shop, where something unique is sure to be found. A curious old Eastern dagger, admirably suitable for a paper knife, takes his eye, and with the remark that, "I hope it is not unlucky," the purchase is completed. On reaching the office, his "surprise for mother" is admired by his fellow clerks, and put away in his desk. A strenuous day's work over, John leaves for his rooms and unfortunately forgets his present for mother. Little did he dream what a tragedy was to follow his lapse of memory. A few hours later, in the stillness that follows a big city's daily noise and bustle, a burglar gains admittance to the office where John is employed. Stealthily ransacking the safe and desks, he discovers the fateful present, and slips it into his pocket. Meanwhile, the president of the company, after a late evening's convivialities, decides to sleep at the office instead of making the long journey home. Entering his own private sanctum, he discovers the burglar at work on his private safe. Taken by surprise, the burglar makes a dash for safety, but is caught in the grip of John's employer. A struggle ensues, and the fatal knife, which, in his frenzy the burglar uses, sends John's respected chief to his death. At the sight of blood, the panic-stricken murderer drops the dagger and escapes through the open window. John, meanwhile, remembers the present and returns to the office for it. There, behind a screen, where he had fallen, John, to his horror, finds the body of his chief, and in the center of the floor lies the dagger. Its evil design seems to hypnotize him. Snatching it up, he sees the blood still wet on the blade, and is there discovered by the police, who, finding the window and door of the office open, have entered to investigate matters. The evidence is damning, the safe is open, and white and trembling stands John West with the dagger in his hands.

Next day, the real murderer, intending to drown his remorse and fright, enters a saloon and there reads of John's arrest. Later, mad with drink, he gets mixed up in a brawl and is arrested and sentenced to two years at penal servitude for dangerously injuring a man. At the central criminal court, a few days later, John is tried for murder. His heart-broken mother and sister believe in his innocence and plead with the counsel for the defense to save their loved one. The evidence is black and accusing, and in the awe-inspiring silence and solemnity of the big court, the scales of justice turn against him. The jury cannot shirk their fearful duty or overlook the damning evidence, and, with bowed heads they return their verdict, "Guilty, my Lord." "Mother, sister, becore God I swear I am innocent." The words rang through the court. The relentless arms of the law pull back their prisoner, and gently but firmly restrain his mother—and amid a never-to-be-forgotten scene of pathos, the grave judge pronounces the last words of the death sentence sentence, "Prepare to meet thy God."

In the condemned cell, John is allowed to bid his last farewell to his dear ones. "Good-bye, mother, my darling mother!" The words choke in his throat, but the course of justice cannot be restrained, and mother and son, sister and brother, with breaking hearts, are parted. Three weeks pass, the day of the execution is at hand. The real murderer is serving out his sentence in the quarries for another crime altogether. Seizing a heavy spade, with a fierce onslaught, he fells the warder, whose back is turned, and dashes for freedom. The alarm is given, and bullets begin to whistle by the fleeing convict. One finds its mark, but stumbling on, the fatally wounded man reaches the home of John West, whose mother and sister, with all hope abandoned, await with dread the tragic hour of execution. Hearing groans at the door, John's mother admits the dying convict and tends his wounds. The warders, hot on the track, reach the house, but their quarry, realizing the end is near, confesses to the murder for which John is about to be hung. With his fast ebbing life, he makes a last effort, and signs the confession. Not a moment is to be lost. The prison doctor's automobile awaits outside, and mother and sister, accompanied by minions of the law, make speed to cheat the scaffold. Obstacles dog their way, the level crossing is blocked, the engine misfires, but at last the place of execution is reached, and John is literally torn from the foot of the scaffold. The happy reunion and congratulations conclude a story which will go right to the hearts of the moving picture lovers.

In Fact, It's a Necessity Wherever Tickets Are Sold.

DISHONEST Ticket Sellers and Ticket Takers HAVE NO CHANCE when our chopper is used, as all tickets dropped into it are cancelled or cut up by a turn of the side wheel, so that they cannot be sold again. Tickets, however, are not mutilated so badly that the numbers cannot be read.

The Chopper is a protection also to honest ticket men. It removes temptation. Equipped with a foot lever instead of wheel if desired.

In construction, the mechanism is simple, strong and accurate. The chopping rollers are of best tool steel, die-cut, and never fail to work properly.

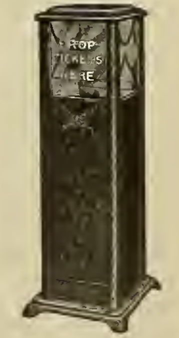
This chopper will permit the door-keeper to handle fully 50 per cent. more patrons than is possible with old system of taking by hand.

Finish: Cabinet is of finest golden quartered oak, mission or mahogany, highly polished, and trimmings are of metal, finished in colored enamel, baked by special process, which retains its brilliancy, or, if desired, all metal parts heavily nickel plated. Glass is best polished French plate, quarter inch thick. Size: 46 x12 x12 inches. Weight (boxed), 150 lbs.

PRICE: Chopper $50. Foot Lever (extra) $10.
Nickel Trimmings (extra) $5.

PHOTOPLAY SECURITY TICKET BOX

BUILT expressly for those who do not require the more expensive "Chopper," Tickets are deposited by patrons upon entering. Of same construction as Photoplay Ticket Chopper, minus the defacing mechanism. In place of same, Security Ticket Box has trap, which when tripped by attendant drops all tickets into chamber below, this being secured by locks.



Price, $35.00

COMPENSARC
This Machine cuts 2/3 from your Light Bills

Mr. Manager

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for 2/3 more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc

saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

Facts and Comments

TRADING on other people's advertising is becoming altogether too common in the amusement world, and we are sorry to say that the moving picture field is by no means free from this evil. Where the effort to profit by other people's advertising is obvious and susceptible of legal proof, the courts will interfere on the ground of unfair competition. Unfortunately there is not always that full measure of proof which the law requires for stepping in and protecting the aggrieved party. Every man in the moving picture business knows of cases where the unfair competition was morally certain, but legally unprovable. The work of the parasite was done in plain view, but there was nothing to stop him.

This state of affairs not only works injury and hardship upon reputable and ambitious manufacturers, but it hurts the entire industry, and is a source of loss and annoyance to exhibitors. As matters stand today, a manufacturer of means and reputation must be afraid to film a great classic. It means the expenditure of great sums of money and the prodigal use of time to produce a big classic feature. There is, of course, no benefit of copyright, and when the feature begins to be advertised, the plagiarist, the parasite and the pirate appear upon the scene and reap where others have sown. The responsible producer is robbed of his just return on the investment. All this has a tendency to discourage high class productions.

The harm strikes not only the individual producer, but the whole industry. The classic masterpieces that have been filmed within the last two or three years, to the great delight and profit of the public, have gained innumerable friends for the motion picture. The successful filming of these masterpieces has convinced the best minds everywhere that the motion picture is very much more than merely a cheap amusement for the masses. The inferior productions, trading on the name of the meritorious ones, will injure this hard-earned fame of the motion picture. It is all very well for people to say, "The public do not care; they cannot tell the difference any way, and, besides, they like to be fooled." The fact is that people resent being fooled and like to be served honestly. The number of discriminating spectators in every audience is constantly growing. Take a well-known example. There were two versions of Dante's Inferno, one very good and the other very bad. The man seeing the poor version will be justified in making unkind remarks about the motion picture, while the other seeing the good version will become a convert to kinematography and will make other converts. The logic of this is undeniable and ought to put a stop to this talk that it makes no difference whether a great subject is filmed conscientiously or merely on a get-rich-quick plan.

IT is an old axiom in the amusement world "to send them home laughing." The axiom is as good as it is old, and is generally followed. A friend of this paper tells us of some horrible exceptions to this rule in various theaters in New York, where a most gruesome and terrifying picture called "The Spanish Inquisition" is making the rounds. This means sending the audience home to bad dreams, and is especially bad for the children. After seeing men broken on the wheel and torn with red-hot pincers, children are apt to wake up with a scream in the middle of the night. "The Spanish Inquisition" is surely a legitimate subject for filming, but to show it at the end of the show, just before the good-night slide, is, to say the least, very poor judgment.

ON another page of this week's issue of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD we print a brief survey of what has been accomplished and of what is now being accomplished in educational kinematography. When we consider that the profits from educational pictures are, in comparison with the dramatic film, uncertain and precarious, the showing is by no means bad. It requires courage and enterprise and foresight of a high order to turn away even for a short time from the things which bring immediate gain and turn to the things from which no sure return can be expected. The maintenance of a high class and finely specialized educational department requires a good deal of money and the constant attention of highly-trained and experienced men. The industry owes an everlasting debt to the pioneers in the educational field. Slowly but surely the day is approaching when the practical film man and the practical schoolman will join hands to introduce the kinematographic course of instruction. When that day arrives the pioneers will have their reward. In the past they have been sustained in their splendid work chiefly by their enthusiasm for their cause rather than by any financial returns. We earnestly hope that some of our own producers will realize the necessity of maintaining a special educational plant. There is no country in the world with greater opportunities for the educational kinematograph.

Much More Than That

By Louis Reeves Harrison

"WHAT is the great primal cause-producer in this world? Thought. Behind every created sentiment, emotion or thing is and ever has been thought—thought held long and strongly enough and in sufficiently concentrated form to shape and fashion and bring into use that sentiment, emotion or thing."

So says a new author, who has hitched her wagon to a star in "The Master Demand."

From another source, from a scholarly essay on "The Wholesome Mission of Motion Pictures," by Harry E. Downer, of Davenport, Iowa, comes an observation on the course pursued by The Moving Picture World which, in itself, shows him to be a thought producer and a man of penetrating intelligence. He speaks in a dispassionate and impartial way of the assaults made on motion pictures at a meeting of the Committee on Police Regulation of the Iowa General Assembly, where speakers and writers characterized the screen exhibitions as so evil in their influence as to constitute a public menace; searches out the real evil and weighs in opposition the good that is done.

He points very clearly to a disgrace that can be easily removed by the police, the offensive advertising at theater entrances, and quotes the Pinkerton detective agency in regard to these placards: "The scenes portraying hold-ups, kidnapping, burglaries, and cowboy-Indian combats ought to be prohibited. They do not have a single meritorious feature and develop the worst instincts in the impressionable youth. Let fathers and mothers demand that the shows visited by their children shall be of a nature that tends to uplift. Popular sentiment demands a better class of pictures, such as innocent minds may view without injurious effect."

Mr. Downer quotes as freely from those who condemn the general run of releases as from those who defend the art for the good it is accomplishing, and argues from an accumulation of facts that the future of motion pictures is decidedly hopeful. His essay is concluded with a reference to The Moving Picture World as a trade paper and "much more than that—the constant champion of the innocent and wholesome features of moving pictures." It is exactly the policy he defines that has put this periodical in the forefront of its kind.

Accused over and over again of reacting against the commercial spirit of the time, the editors and reviewers of a trade paper that is "much more than that" really belong to this age in combating the evils of past ages that have persisted in it. The original idea of the founder was to stand for what was progressive. Circumstances beyond swift calculation have aided in the marvelous success of motion-picture production and inflated those who reaped tremendous profits from it by combination and led them to obstruct natural development from the point of view of special privilege. During the early history of this New Art the natural channels of energy were everywhere choked by commercialism.

During long centuries of humanity's evolution the various arts have attained perfection through spontaneous instincts of genius. Wherever and whenever genius was released and encouraged great masterpieces appeared. In this art no such emancipation has arrived. The only way in which intelligent effort has been expended with hope of adequate reward has been in the mechanical reproduction and exhibition of what costs little or nothing in the scenario. It is almost entirely on that account that moving pictures, best suited of all mediums to express what is real and true, preserve much of antiquated stage artificiality and theatrical adherence to the "once was."

Nearly all the directors and actors in this form of interpretation that has so little of live interest to interpret rather pride themselves on a former theatrical experience, and they are more or less impressed by the platitudinous precepts of the older art, and responsibility for what is false or inane in moving pictures must be laid to those whose entire attention and expenditure is given to the form of expression to the detriment of what is expressed. It is not difficult to perceive under these circumstances why the art that seems destined to depict life as it is or as it should be is just now in its swaddling clothes. It is a healthy baby howling for the nourishment that will enable it to grow. It needs food containing phosphates.

The men of this paper have consistently combated what is primitive, putrid or brutal in this splendid new means of communicating thought, have conceived life to be something better than an existence of vengeance and slaughter, have hoped that the beauty, grandeur and charm of our God-given progression might be communicated to those whose dark hours need illumination. They have battled for all that is helpful, cheering and of contemporaneous interest to audiences of to-day against the pitifully archaic as well as what is unreal and inhuman, and it is a pleasure for them to have a scholarly essayist openly voice recognition of what they have been trying to accomplish.

One of the relics of theatricalism that detracts from the force of moving pictures is the attempt to replace personality with costumes, wigs and other accessories of make-up. The greater number of those who attend the exhibitions are no longer children, and the attempt to thrust aside their sense of naturalness and realism by obvious disguises, by impossible resemblances, by the Elizabethan make-beliefs of the play-house, by ignoring the deeper desires of the audience, is puerile. Falsity and unreality are never more conspicuous than when half hidden.

Vivid, direct and passionate appeal can only come from what has at least the illusion of fidelity to present ideals and from the exposition of some great truth that strikes response in the breasts of those watching the representation. The lights and shadows of the screen should be those of the human heart of to-day. They must quicken innate love of beauty, stir poetic passion, reach out with what will give strength to humanity, clarify the problems of experience, point the way to better conditions of living, or they will fail and fall, will deservedly receive the quiet contempt of intelligent men and women. It will be no small task to formulate a scenario along the best lines, and it will not be undertaken as long as present conditions obtain. Only when the effort of brains is suitably rewarded and recognized will go forth a photodrama armed with a truth genius has forged so well that it may be understood in all parts of the world.

"Behind every created sentiment, emotion or thing is and ever has been thought—thought held long and strongly enough and in sufficiently concentrated form to shape and fashion and bring into use that sentiment, emotion or thing."

"Dal Vero"

By W. Stephen Bush

THE Italian producers of motion pictures have a simple but striking expression for what we call scenic views. They speak of scenic views as pictures "dal vero"—pictures of the truth or portrayals of the real. Note the implied contrast—scenic views are views of the true and actual, while dramatic films are different. Some of our best and most conscientious producers are in Italy, and I must needs believe that their dramatic portrayals are no less "dal vero" than their scenic pictures. There are, however, a goodly number of the cheaper sort of producers in Italy, and their portrayals of life are anything but "dal vero" or true to life. Alas, they have their counterparts here. Thus we see on the screen altogether too many things which cannot, and actually do not, occur in the life that is going on all around us day after day and night after night.

The notion still prevails in the heads of many producers that the studio is a place where motion pictures are made, just as the clothing factory is the place where clothes are made. Motion pictures are not made in the studio: they are only reflected there. A place where a man stands with a camera making pictures of a jumble of furniture with men and women running about and making gestures while a soi-disant director is shouting "instructions" is not a moving picture studio where the life of man is reflected as in a mirror, but it is nothing but a factor or a sweatshop with a foolish pretense to art. Such a sweatshop is a thousand miles away from "dal vero."

The men who preside over the destinies of these sweatshops resemble the position of the man with the hand-organ in the world music. If they would only profit by the experience of the talking pictures, which, after all the fuss and fury, remain more or less impracticable, simply because they cannot reproduce the human voice with absolute perfection. It is not a performance "dal vero." From somewhere comes a weird sound which we know at once does not come from the human throat. Sometimes this sound is just audible, sometimes it is painfully loud, but in either case the illusion is destroyed and the thing becomes tiresome.

In the kinematographic sweatshops the admixture of the unreal is always too large. It is a most provoking characteristic of the conductors of these sweatshops to assume in their audiences a degree of intelligence much inferior to their own. When their pictures find no favor in the eyes of the public, and exchanges, in sheer self-defense, do not want to buy any more, these producers never pause to consider the possible why and wherefore. It is a piece of angelic kindness to tell them that much of their failure is due to their persistent underestimation of the public intelligence. The plain people, which constitute the vast majority of moving picture patrons, are very quick to recognize what is "dal vero" and what is artificial and palpably unreal.

Go into any moving picture theater in any part of the country, and when certain brands of film are projected upon the ever-patient screen the cry goes up, "How silly." That is enough of a condemnation. Ninety-nine per cent. of us are so constituted that we loathe what is false or fabricated or distorted, and the moment we see it on the screen we are stung into quick resentment. It would be easy indeed to fill pages with a description of instances of this flagrant deviation from "dal vero," or even from the ordinary probabilities of life. One great source of this shocking violation of the probabilities lies in the suddenness with which men and women change their emotions on the screen.

It happens too often that the outraged dignity of a wife who has discovered a grave offense by the husband is appeased in almost a second. In the beginning of a scene perhaps not more than a hundred feet in length, the wretched wife is bathed in tears; then follows a veritable cloudburst of indignation, and two seconds afterward the wounded spouse relents and reposes trustfully on the bosom of her lord, who in the same short time has gone through all the emotions of shame, grief, remorse and penitence. With equally unreasoning swiftness do prattling grandchildren melt the hearts of irate grandfathers. It is by no means always the cheaper producer who is guilty of this saddening departure from the standards of "dal vero." But recently I saw a drama of domestic infelicity in which the wronged husband in less than a minute affectionately forgave his wife and shook hands with the man who had threatened to invade his home. This preposterously unreal picture bore a famous trade-mark.

What wonders could be achieved if the camera were to reproduce drama with the same "dal vero" fidelity which characterizes its recording of scenic views. There has been, and there is now, a good deal of work deserving of this praise of being "dal vero" in the depicting of the drama. There is a master of "dal vero" in the art of filming the dramatic elements in life, and he has a host of imitators. They often succeed in copying him in nonessentials, but the great secret itself, the following of "dal vero" in all dramatic subjects, they have not been able to learn.

While we are on this subject it seems proper to add that not even in the drama does a departure from the rules of "dal vero" hurt more than in comedies. We are sick unto death of farce comedies. To label them as "farce" comedies is some concession to the public, but no amount of labeling will make them acceptable when they are offered to us by the gross. A sense of humor is a gift direct from the heights of Olympus, and the man who can dramatize his sense of humor to make other people see the fun of things and laugh thereat, is a prime favorite both of Apollo and Athene, but Heaven defend us from the manufactured comedy that is hoisted into the celluloid by means of a derrick. In comedies, if you cannot follow the infallible plumb of "dal vero," it is better to depart into the wilderness where there are no studios and no electric current for moving picture shows.

MELIES MAKES CATEGORICAL DENIAL.

A few weeks ago our Los Angeles correspondent dug up the information that "Pop" Gaston Melies was about to retire from the film manufacturing business. Now "Pop" Melies is one of the three original "Pops" of the film business, the others being "Pop" Lubin and "Pop" Rock, all of whom are pledged to die in the harness. Consequently when "Pop" Melies read the announcement of his premature retirement he protested and made the following categorical denial:

"The Melies Company is not at Santa Paula.

"I have not resigned from the position I have occupied in my firm.

"I do not intend to take any more pictures at Santa Paula and my studio there is offered for sale, a fact that should be known to you, inasmuch, as we have inserted two advertisements in your paper to that effect.

"Mr. Hugh McClung did not resign from the organization in Japan, but was told by me in Japan his services would be no longer needed when we would reach San Francisco. He did not return with the company, but with my wife and myself only."

And there you are. The Moving Picture World wishes "Pop" Gaston Melies a continuance of life and prosperity.

A Survey of the Educational Field

By W. Stephen Bush.

WE are not unreasonable in asking the educational kinematograph to give an account of itself. We are justified in asking the question: Is there anything solid and practical back of the mists of theory and the fogs of discussion? Have any of the vaunted possibilities of the educative force of the motion picture been realized? Our American producers have contributed to the supply of educational films by occasional scenic and industrial releases and, I believe, a few pictures of animal life. When we examine the first complete catalogue of educational pictures issued by Mr. Charles Urban, a great pioneer who has deserved so well of the educational film we find that by far the greater number of pictures with an instructive value have been made abroad. The catalogue of Mr. George Kleine, published more recently and frequently drawing upon the work of Urban for its sources of information, will reveal the same fact of the great predominance of European pictures. I have no doubt whatever that this predominance will not last and that the American producer will eventually assume the same importance in the educational field which he has held in the dramatic branch from the beginnings of the industry. The first step toward this end must be the establishment of separate educational workshops and studios under the special guidance of men, who possess the necessary qualifications both as photographers and as men of science. At the present time there is not, as far as I know, a single American producer who maintains a well equipped special studio devoted entirely to scientific and microscopic research by means of the kinematograph.

The only three educational studios of which we have any knowledge are all situated in Paris—belonging to the Pathe, Gaumont and Eclair companies respectively.

Of these three it seems to me the Pathe establishment is the most complete and pretentious. It is in charge of Professor Comandon, aided by a corps of capable assistants. Professor Comandon has at his disposal practically an entire building separate from the rest of the great plant at Vincennes. He is a man specially fitted for his work. Of course, he is an ardent believer in the educational kinematograph and whatever he has done so far has been done exceedingly well. M. Comandon takes a special interest in filming manifestations of the lower forms of life such as the amoeba and infuseria. It was my privilege to sit beside him while some of his films depicting the life of the amoeba were being displayed in the splendid projection room which is part of the educational studio. These glimpses into the workshop of Nature must fill every thinking mind with wonder and awe and reverence. The amoeba is the lowest form of organic life. The pictures follow the life of the amoeba in its every detail. They show the fluctuations of currents consisting of countless little globulae. The flow of these currents is wonderfully regulated. The movement of the globulae is really the movement of the amoeba itself. The longer one looks at these currents and counter currents the more marvelous seems the care which plastic Nature bestows upon even this the lowest manifestation of life. It is said that these globulae in the amoeba correspond to the cells in the human creature of which indeed they seem a very faint prototype. All these pictures were magnified from 25 to 50 times the actual size. Equally marvelous were the exhibitions of the infusoria, forms of life which may be found in almost every drop of water. Here, too, one was struck with the existence of an unfailing mysterious law according to which the infusoria moved. Perhaps the word "moved" is not fully descriptive of this action of the infusoria—their movements really were nothing more than an expansion alternating with a contraction. All these things are, of course, wholly invisible to the naked eye. It is easy to see how much this power of the combination of the miscroscope and the kinematograph means to biological research. Professor Comandon's whole department is full of wonders. He has pictures showing the development of the embryo of a chicken, the action of the heart of a rabbit and various parts of the human body under the action of the X-ray. When I visited the professor he was busy with microscopic experiments intended to show the growth of fungus. For these pictures the professor had "rigged" up a special apparatus. In all his work he uses the latest and best instruments. He has marvelous patience. Many a time hundreds of feet of film and precious hours of time are lost through some unforeseen accident, but the professor only smiles and begins anew. Little does the general public or even the exhibitor realize what an outlay of money and skill is represented by even a very short educational film.

It does seem to me that the industry and the perseverance and the indefatigable courage of such men as Professor Comandon ought to be made known to the general public and that the intelligent exhibitor ought not to neglect these grand opportunities to show the public of his city what a precious asset the kinematograph is to modern civilization.

This opens up great and new opportunities for a line of advertising which has heretofore been more or less neglected. A little more emphasis given to the educational will never do any harm. I have never seen a single educational picture which did not deserve the title popular and interesting. There surely cannot be anything more interesting than the wonders of creative Nature.

I asked the professor to let me see the picture of "The Birth of a Dragon Fly," and to tell me something about how it was taken. M. Comandon, like so many other men who are eminent in the world of science, is the soul of modesty and dislikes to speak either of himself or of his work, preferring to let the latter do all the talking. I could, however, glean from what he said that it required much time and that many experiments were made before the picture was finally ready for the screen. The picture itself testified to me that the greatest of all the divine gifts is the spirit of poetry. Look at this picture, "The Birth of the Dragon Fly," scene for scene and it seems as if Tennyson had written the subtitles. It is true indeed that the poet sees by the glance of intuition what the scientist can only discover after laborious research. The last scene of the picture is especially impressive. The dragon fly has at last shaken off its filmy shackles and draws not without a painful effort the first breath of life. I had best quote the words of the poet and let the reader judge for himself.

> "To-day I saw the dragon fly
> Come from the wells where he did lie
> An inner impulse rent the veil
> Of his old husk from head to tail
> Came out clear plates of sapphire mail.
> He dried his wings, like gauze they grew
> Thro' crofts and pastures wet with dew
> A living flash of light he flew."

The educational departments in the Gaumont and the Eclair studios have produced some interesting pictures of natural history and each of them is equipped with special instruments for scientific work. In all the studios named an elaborate kinematographic outfit is maintained for recording the movements in the growth of flowers, plants and vegetable life generally. This apparatus is at work day and night and always under the supervision of capable assistants. Eclair and Gaumont turn out about one educational subject per week, while the Pathe average is much greater.

A survey of the educational field, however rapid, would be incomplete without reference to the valuable pioneer work done by Mr. Charles Urban. A vast amount of educational work of a general and varied character has been done by Mr. Urban, both in colors and in black and white. He has now a range of subjects covering much in the line of natural history. Some of these pictures were obtained only after weeks and perhaps months of patient watching and clever camera work. Moving pictures of the larger species of animals are difficult to obtain. To be worth anything at all such pictures must be taken when the animal is not looking, for the animal is even more self-conscious when in captivity and confronted with the camera than some moving picture actors we have known. With laudable courage and enterprise the Urban operators tackled the portrayal of shy and secretive animals as otters and cranes and kingfishers. In the picture showing the life and habits of the otter some of the preparations necessary to get at the animal in its haunts below the water are described in pictures on the screen, lending a delicious touch of humor to the exhibition. We all delight in watching pretty and interesting animals when they believe themselves unobserved. All such delight is offered to the fullest in the pictures mentioned. The scenes from bird life are especially replete with this singular charm. The kingfisher is seen swooping down on its prey, a small sunfish, and flying with it to a safe place. The kingfisher is not a quick lunch bird, but likes to pick out a cosy nook where he can take his meal at leisure. In one scene the bird is seen holding his prey down with one foot and then deftly turning the fish's head against a log and beating out its brain. Not less interesting and amusing is the life of the crane, which the operator succeeded in getting sometimes within two or three feet of his object. It would consume far more space than now at my disposal to enumerate all these lively and entertaining pictures, nor is it necessary to make such an enumeration here because Mr. Urban's catalogue is at the disposal of any one who cares to write for it. Mr. Urban's films, in which, for the purposes of this article, I venture to include the films now controlled by the Kineto Company of London and by the Urban Trading Company have a wide range. Aside from the big and varied assemblage of portrayals of animal life there is a choice collection of films dealing with industries and the use and development of machinery. The greatest and longest of this kind of pictures is of course the Panama Canal.

Scenic pictures and descriptions of the customs of nations and tribes complete the present supply of educational films. Of these latter there is great variety and if one would take the trouble I feel sure that a most interesting ethnological series could be got together. Here, too, the pictures of European makers are more numerous than our own, although Edison, Selig and Kalem have occasionally contributed. The Kalems have given us some interesting pictures dealing with the life of big cities.' Their release showing odd occupations in the city of New York is a new and happy lead in educational films which I would like to see followed up.

MISS BARBARA TENNANT.

Miss Barbara Tennant, the leading woman of the Eclair American company, who in the eighteen months she has been with that company has made so many friends, has left for a month's vacation in Massachusetts. She intends to put in a good part of the time fishing; also she will join a party in an automobile trip through the eastern part of the State.

Miss Tennant is an English girl, and has been away from her native shores but a little over two years. During the time she has been with the Eclair Company she has played almost three hundred parts. These comprise a wide range, proving her versatility and bringing to her an experience that will be certain to give her a rank among picture players even higher than that she now holds. It may be said in all truth that Miss Tennant has a most charming personality. Possibly its most striking factor are the eyes—large, dark, expressive—an endowment so important to a picture player. She also is gifted with a good stage voice—clear, cultivated; so she may confront the phonograph as fearlessly as she faces the camera.

Miss Barbara Tennant.

Some of the more notable work Miss Tennant has done in recent weeks is in "The Trail of the Hanging Rock," released July 9, in which she plays a double role, that of a delicate mother who dies, and of the robust daughter who grows to womanhood; in "Sons of a Soldier," released May 7; in "Fortune's Pet," released July 18; in "The Greater Call," released July 23, a powerful three-reel drama of the dregs and elixir of life. Coming Eclair releases in which Miss Tennant will be featured are "The Honor of Lady Beaumont," in which she plays the thoughtless, extravagant English woman of title who learns too late the true color of happiness, and in "The Thirst for Gold," wherein she appears as an amusing, irresponsible country maiden who dances through her scenes. Also coming is a series of pictures in which Miss Tennant will be featured in a role that we are assured will prove as entertaining as it is novel.

BRITISH NOTES.

Mr. Alfred Wrench, apparatus and projector manufacturer of Greys Inn Road, London, whose goods are known on both sides of the Atlantic, died this week at the age of 52.

I was present at a demonstration in London a few days ago at the premises of the Viking Manufacturing Company of Woodside, Croyden, which has invented a moving picture screen of such construction that the image projected upon it is as plainly discernible to people seitting off the side of the screen as to those immediately in front. In color the texture is silver-grey, and the effect is produced with small ridges running from end to end of the fabric. Forty amperes of electricity produces on this screen as powerful a light as seventy amps gives on many others.

A day or two ago a party of schoolboys from the Dickens' School, Ealing, visited a local picture theater and, as a protest against a Western cowboy film of the ultra-sensational order, they garbed themselves as Indians and cowpunchers and showed the manager of that theater how such subjects should be played. The film in question was one of a well-known Chicago firm who have recently earned quite a reputation for sensationalism of the stereotyped cowboy order.

In a few weeks the Hepworth Company, of London, will release the first of their series of "Florence Turner" films. The pictures will treat solely Miss Turner in some of the character studies and impersonations which have recently sealed her popularity on the variety stage here.

* * *

The publicity given to the Imp Film Company's production of "Ivanhoe" at Chepstow Castle has spurred the home firms to fresh activities. The other day the London Zenith Company enacted "Ivanhoe," but used as their background the Tower of London. Two hundred players were used in the tableaus and the company was only permitted the use of the ancient edifice between 5:30 and 9:30 o'clock in the morning.

The Kinemacolor Company recently entertained at its place in London, Mr. John Burns, the president of the local government board, and two medical secretaries. Several scientific films were seen and an important pronouncement by the honorable gentleman would not come as a surprise.

J. B. SUTCLIFFE.

MOORE AN ACTOR ONCE MORE.

Eugene Moore, who was for many years with the original Thanhouser theatrical stock company in Milwaukee, and who went under Mr. Thanhouser's management again in the latter's films, where he served up to the day of his appointment as a director some months ago, will be seen as a picture actor again—once. "The Spartan Father" is the title of the single reappearance. The principal part in the play was of an aggressive "character" type that Mr. Moore used to portray in the Thanhouser theatrical and photoplay productions; so Lloyd Lonergan, the author of the piece, used honeyed words on Moore and got him to enact the role as well as direct the picture. The Thanhouser films Moore will be best remembered in are: "The Politician," "The Patriot," "A Mystery of Wall Street," "Good Morning, Judge," "For Another's Sin," and "The Boomerang." With the exception of a bit now and then in some picture he was directing, Moore has stuck tight to producing work and his reappearance as an actor will surprise and please a lot of his old admirers.

"Little Dorrit"

Thanhouser Feature.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

NOT to be classed with "The Snare of Fate" and the beautiful story of the Blind Princess recently released by the same company. I saw the first applauded generously by a large audience at the Wadsworth and learned that the latter had been the subject of much favorable comment in another audience, one lady remarking, as she left the theater, that it was the most beautiful play ever shown on the screen. "Little Dorrit" is produced with care and good taste, but that and the title constitutes nearly the sum of its values.

The novel is really a satire on the English Civil Service as represented by the Circumlocution Office long ago. The motive is of other days. So is the debtor's prison as occupied by the Father of the Marshalsea, Little Dorrit's father. Her simple story is merely one of a tangle of minor interests so far as the original work is concerned. As portrayed on the screen it shows her eventless birth and growth in the prison, her work as a seamstress, her devotion to her father while he lived and her marriage to Clennon. The enormous amount of space devoted to showing that her character was an unselfish one is almost destitute of dramatic action, and tension is nowhere visible.

Scene from "Little Dorrit" (Thanhouser).

The skilled dramatist of today could show that the leading character was unselfish in a few preparatory scenes. Let us grant that she is unselfish—that is a matter of characterization—her career, thereafter, is almost purely negative. A chance acquaintance discovers an inheritance and eventually marries her. In scenario form the story would read, "Unselfish girl, born in prison, receives inheritance and releases her father. At his death she marries the man who found the money."

Dramatists and critics may disagree as to details, but all men skilled in the business are united in one opinion which was admirably voiced by Boucicault. The one object of his life was to interest the people in front. The one study of his life was the mixed audience he addressed. "To be realistic," he said, "the drama must reflect the period in which it is produced." He tried all kinds and found the adaptation of motive gone stale was a bore to those in front. Dion Boucicault succeeded and failed often enough to set him thinking, and he came to the conclusion that people are most deeply affected by destinies closely akin to their own. We are interested in our problems, in our tragedies and comedies, in what our fate is to be. You can paste it up in the studio that "drama must reflect the period in which it is produced."

Director and actors have done their best to make the "Little Dorrit" adaptation interesting. There is nothing to be accomplished by singling them out—they have made the most of their opportunities—for they can all do better. Put the spirit of Dickens into a play of today, into problems of the hour, burning questions that quickly light the flame of human emotion. Charles Dickens was essentially the defender of the humble. He illustrated over and over again that to be illustrious was nothing: to be merely useful was not enough. We must reach out into the hearts of others and live their thoughts and feelings in order to appreciate the full meaning of existence. Use the spirit of Dickens in a modern play.

"The Carpenter"

Reviewed by Rev. W. H. Jackson.

THIS recent Vitagraph release is worthy of special mention here, a strange picture, neither of its titles—"The Carpenter" or "The Stranger in Gray"—carry with it any suggestion of its purpose; this is no fault, however, an ambiguous title often helps to concentrate the mind on the hidden lesson of the story. Such a course is profitable in this instance, every beholder is led to follow along unexpected lines, only to learn a most profitable lesson, besides realizing that an acceptable truth has been greatly forced home to the very soul, where it finds a quiet abiding place.

When one has seen the picture, one cannot help renaming it The Spirit of "The Carpenter," for it is realized that the carpenter of the story is the carpenter of Nazareth, hidden under the personality of a welcome visitor "in gray."

Scene from "The Carpenter" (Vitagraph).

The strength of the picture lies in its appropriate mysticism, which, not being over-wrought, holds the mind in a quiet state of analyzing wonder, until the whole truth is realized. Cast in war times and surroundings, the contentions which tore this nation cause a severe division in this household; the son is opposed to the father, and espouses the opposite cause and is hated therefor and, as was not uncommon in those days, brothers fight against brothers. A second trouble arises in the coming financial ruin of the old home, while a third evil is seen in the advantage being taken of a young wife of one of the sons, by a visiting friend of alluring manners; hatred, ruin, and jealousy, are working their insidious way in dreaded canker-like manner, in this once happy and prosperous home.

During all this time, "The Carpenter" is visiting the battle field and the home, wherever he goes his quietly superior demeanor commands respect, he creates a calm, and inspires confidence. It is now beginning to dawn upon the beholder that this spirit is so Christ-like that the very features of the man are those made familiar by the representations of the true Christ. There is an unknown Christ in the home moulding the control of events and bringing prosperity, peace, and happiness, if allowed to do so by a willing yielding to his gracious influences. The tempter of the young wife is brought face to face with his wrongs and relents; by his withdrawing the young couple are restored to the former unalloyed love and happiness.

Scene from "The Carpenter" (Vitagraph).

The father values an old family portrait, yet cannot appreciate the fact that it possesses the intrinsic value which he has been told it does; "The Carpenter" causes him to take it from its hanging place, opens the back and reveals the hidden wealth, which is sufficient to restore the lost family fortune. The war is over, maimed and battle stained the brothers are returning home, but the old hatred is still there, the father is relentless; again the visitor comes in the role of peace-maker, his superior calm stills the storm, his quiet words are spoken with the authority of truth, and he prevails; a reunited home is the outcome of his work. His work is done—love, truth, purity, prosperity, peace and happiness prevail; what more can be done; an ideal family life is the result of his gracious influence, he can now leave them; he passes away into the night waving his parting blessing. Let this picture be seen everywhere moving pictures are shown; it is a revelation and inspiration at the same time, a mind purifier and home peacemaker, a strong sermon in a drama, the stronger because it is preached before the people are aware that they have listened, and are pleased at the advantage taken of them. Mr. Kent's portrayal of "The Carpenter" is most commendable, and is a lesson on the dignity of calmness, and the assurance of truth; this picture is an educator.

NEW STARS WITH ESSANAY.

Doris Mitchell has been engaged by the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company to portray leading roles. Miss Mitchell played with the Marlow Stock Company in Chicago for several seasons, enacting various roles in everything from Shakespeare to comic opera. Possessed with unusual beauty and exceptional talent, much is expected of her in forthcoming Essanay productions. As a foil for this charming comedienne, Essanay has engaged Richard C. Travors.

Mr. Travors brings an enviable record of success to Essanay, both as a leading factor in the legitimate field and also in photoplay, being associated with the Lubin Company of Philadelphia for over two years. He left the Lubin people to accept an engagement from Wagenhalls & Kemper's "Paid in Full." He has also appeared in Liebler's "Alias Jimmy Valentine," Shubert's "Girls," Wm. A. Brady's "Making Good" and "A Gentleman of Leisure," and with Chas. Klein's production of "The Gamblers." His last appearance on Broadway was in "The Passing of the Idle Rich."

"THE GREEN GOD OR THE FLOWER GIRL OF MONTMARTRE."

Union Features—Three Reels.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

This feature may well be classed as an honest effort. It deals with a picture of Parisian life and is distinctly French throughout. The story is simple and not too conventional. There is excellent work by the actors and actresses. I like the clever selection of types, the conscientious attention to detail and the camera experience displayed throughout. It is scarcely necessary to dwell on the excellence of photography in a film made by the Eclair Company.

Ondine "Eclair"

Scene from "The Green God" (Union Features).

The plot shows the machinations of a jealous woman and an unscrupulous old roue to bring about the ruin of a young girl who has kept her innocence in the midst of temptation. A scheme is set afoot to incriminate the flower girl through the nefarious trick of a mercenary detective. The trick, however, does not succeed in the end and the last scene shows the flower girl vindicated and reconciled to her youthful lover who had been tempted to wander after strange gods.

Augustus Thomas Joins the M. P.s.

Famous American Playwright Gets in Step With Progress—Talks Entertainingly of His Plans.

By W. Stephen Bush.

Place: The World of Motion Pictures.

Time: The Present.

Enter: Augustus Thomas, actor, author, dramatist and man of affairs.

WHEN a man of distinguished parts manifested in a record of achievements enters the field of dramatic kinematography the event is worth noting. Mr. Thomas is conservative in spite of his brilliancy. He realizes that in helping to launch the All Star Feature Corporation and in becoming the inspiration of its future he has set himself a task of no mean proportions. He does not come into the Temple of Kinematography in the spirit of the Pharisee who thanks his God that he is not like other (moving picture) men. The most the famous builder of dramas will say for himself is that he is willing and anxious to learn, and that a record of thirty years of admitted mistakes is not a bad commendation for what remains of the future.

The mind of the dramatist is much like that of the sculptor—it sees the finished concrete product plainly long before the chisel begins to work. Hence, it is the habit of the dramatist to speak in conscious epigram. In this way Mr. Thomas accounts for the constant shower of epigrams which refreshes all conversation with him.

Mr. Augustus Thomas.

"The moving picture," said the distinguished author, "is too fluid and flexible to be held in the hollow of any one man's hand; you might just as well try to hold mercury between your fingers. Nothing holds human attention as securely as the moving picture. Now, as to my plans—there is no set or inflexible plan. The man who has or thinks he has such a set of plans is on the breakers already. All plans here are subject to great malleability. In a general way, the policy of the company will be to produce plays of repute and popularity. I am here in an advisory or perhaps a supervisory capacity, a sort of retained counsel, but don't put too strong an accent on the 'retained.' I expect to be active in the preparation of the scenarios and there is much I expect to do in the field and in the studio, but a good deal of the work will be intrusted for the present, at least, into more experienced hands."

What Mr. Thomas said about actors for the silent, as contracted with actors of the speaking stage, was said with some degree of diffidence. He said he did not just then feel competent to go deeply into that question, but he made it plain that in selecting artists for his productions he would by no means confine himself to the thespians of the speaking stage.

"We surely," he declared, "do not mean to restrict ourselves to the actors of the speaking stage. Many fine artists have been developed on the silent stage, and their experience, as well as the following they have gained, appear to us as valuable assets. In the case of the actor on the silent stage it is more proper to speak of his public rather than of his audience, for none have heard him. In the end, however, the difference between the artists of the camera and the artists of the speaking stage is largely temperamental and nothing more. There are actors who have been made great by plays and then again there are artists who have made a play famous. Whenever you find one of the latter kind you have a good picture actor. We will try to get the prominent parts in our plays accepted by the same men and women who acted in them before—this will lend an air of truth to the picture and will seem like recognizing old friends. We will always try to have at least one artist of stellar prominence.

"There was a time when actors under legitimate management were thought to violate their dignity by accepting engagements on the silent stage, but that belief is passing away. The dignity of the work does not lie in the work itself, but in the spirit with which one approaches the work. No man is greater than his elevation. The higher up we are the larger our horizon. A man with five years' experience often thinks he is striking twelve when he is only striking half past six."

Speaking of the range and quality of the pictures to be put on the market by the All Star Feature Corporation, Mr. Thomas said: "Of course we realize that not all plays are suitable for reproduction in motion pictures. It would surely be foolish to try and film such a play as 'The Importance of Being Earnest.' Some plays are entirely out of the question. The motion picture has had something to do with the recoil from the teacup play. The theater itself realizes that the demand is for something other than the teacup play. The public want vital stories, stories with physical conflict. The further away we get from the physical conflict the nearer we get to the library and to metaphysics. There is a portion of our audience rather favoring the metaphysical, but they are limited, just as the readers of books on metaphysical subjects are limited."

The All Star Feature Corporation has a good steersman to act as its pilot in moving picture waters: Harry Raver. He has his finger on every single detail in the practical part of things and his optimism as to the future of the corporation seems not ill founded. Raver has seen Mr. Thomas in full action over in Staten Island, where "Arizona" has been begun, and from what he has seen, he predicts great things from the playwright who has joined the great M. P. cavalcade. The corporation, Mr. Raver says, will release about one feature a month. On the roster of prospective releases are such plays as "Traveling Salesman," "In Missouri," "The Chorus Lady," "Alabama," "Colorado," "The Earl of Pawtucket," "Sporting Duchess," "The Arab," "The Country Boy," "Paid in Full," "The Light Eternal," "Pierre of the Plains," "Checkers," "The Wolf," "The Witching Hour," and many others.

For the forthcoming production of "Arizona," which will be the first release of the corporation, the services of Cyril Scott have been secured to act the part of Denton. Extraordinary attention is being given to the details of uniforms and all things military, for attention to details is one of the hobbies of Augustus Thomas.

EXCHANGE CO. MEETS.

A meeting of the members of the Independent Exchange Co. was held in Detroit, Friday, July 25, at which all but two of the members were present. One of the principal questions discussed was, whether or not the present conditions warranted the continuation of the organization. After a lengthy discussion, in which many present took part, it was carried that the company be preserved intact. P. A. Powers was among those present.

POWERS IN WARNER'S FEATURES.

Warner's Features has reorganized and increased its capital. P. A. Powers has been elected president. Abe Warner is vice-president and general manager. It will handle the product of a number of new companies.

ALTERING BUILDING FOR PICTURE HOUSE.

Harry Crandall, proprietor of the La Grand Airdome, Washington, D. C., has begun extensive alterations to the building corner of Ninth and E Streets, N. W., that city, for a moving picture theater. When ready for business it will be the only theater in the downtown district of Washington to be devoted entirely to the policy of moving pictures. It will have a seating capacity of 550.

"The Mystery of West Sedgwick."

An Edison Feature of High Tension.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

A DETECTIVE story of exciting suspense dramatized from "The Gold Bag," by Carolyn Wells. Hour after hour, preceding the murder of a great financier, his relations with family, friends and servants are shown in order that all who might profit by the sudden ending of his life may be indicated, though it is not to be expected in a story of this kind that the real criminal will be pointed out, rather that he will be covered and others suggested. A true dramatic situation is, however, set up, true according to some great critics, when a detective of penetrating intelligence, represented ably by Bigelow Cooper, is brought into the case.

Carolyn Wells is one of many brilliant writers who have not yet attained immortality in school books. Her varied work is none the less enjoyable on that account, and I am more than delighted that the Edison Company's progressive manager—he seems to thrive on criticism—has added another leaf to the wreath he will some day wear by visualizing stories of the period by writers of the period. There are other creations of Carolyn Wells, notably a certain fascinating widow who could not make up her mind, eminently suited to photodramatization—I wish some one would suggest a shorter word than that. To be objectively lifelike a screen presentation should be of the time in which it is released.

Scene from "The Mystery of West Sedgwick" (Edison).

Sir Conan, formerly Doctor Doyle, has accustomed us to the detective who perceives what is so minute or so remote as to leave scarcely any traces of its image on the mind, who can form from many and complex images an idea, draw strange inferences and reach marvelous conclusions. Such is Cooper in this role. He opens with a deduction made from a combination of trivial facts that the unknown wearer of a pair of shoes left with a bootblack is deaf in his right ear and out the previous evening with a young lady in Brooklyn. Sherlock Holmes has so familiarized us with this sort of stuff that we gulp it down and manage to hold it there until Sherlock Cooper is called to solve the "Mystery of West Sedgwick," where his will combats and overcomes puzzling and opposing evidence.

Such is the screen drama as portrayed by a splendid cast, embracing some of the finest actors in the Edison company. Suspense is sustained to the last moment by a series of complications which point first to one, then another, as the real author of the crime. The average hero in screen productions plans little and achieves even less—he merely drifts along the line of least resistance. The hero in this case seems to be up against obstacles insurmountable, but he knows what he wants and bends all the power of his mind to dissipating clouds of suspicion that he may find the real criminal among those of possible guilt.

This form of drama is well approved by great critics. Stevenson said that "a good play must be founded on one of the passionate cruces of life, where duty and inclination come nobly to the grabble." Goethe declared that the hero of a play must be its active factor; "All events oppose him, and he either clears and removes every obstacle, or he becomes their victim." Brunetiere offers about the same theory as a law of the drama, and his views are entitled to great respect, though we may yet receive greater enlightenment on this very interesting subject.

H. AMBROSIO.

THE FOUNDER OF "AMBROSIO."

The above is a splendid likeness of Signor H. Ambrosio, founder and active head of the world-famous Ambrosio Company. Mr. Ambrosio is still in the prime of life, an indefatigable worker, a warm picture enthusiast and the artistic head of his company.

Not many men bear the splendid record of successes that has fallen to the lot of Mr. Ambrosio. His company has long been known to American picture goers, a fact which in itself speaks volumes for the energy of its head. He loves his work, spends the greater part of his waking hours in the origination of plans for its future and has recently produced, under his personal direction, one of the world's real masterpieces. "The Last Days of Pompeii," owned by the Photo-Drama Company, an Illinois corporation, will soon be seen by American picture fans. Advance reports of its greatness and beauty testify well for the hustle and artistic genius of Ambrosio.

KLEINE TO USE BROADWAY STARS.

George Kleine, always a pioneer in those changes which directly affect some important phase of the picture business, announces that he will soon perfect arrangements that will permit the showing of certain famous Broadway stars in the foreign film which he now exploits. It is Mr. Kleine's plan to take the players with him to France or Italy, as the scenario dictates, and use the splendid technical organizations of the foreign plants.

"Breaking Into the Big League."

Kalem Two-Reel Release.

THE Kalem Company will release on August 20 a picture in which is featured the members of the New York National League team, known to baseball fame as the Giants. The scenes in which are shown in action the players of the New York club are tied together by a story in which appears three members of the Kalem company. The plot is rather attenuated, as is to be expected in a picture of this sort; that is, where a story is written around a given situation. Harry Millarde is the actor who essays the role of a baseball player. It is hardly likely that Mr. Millarde will claim that he displays on the diamond the same proficiency he shows on the screen. Nor is it to be expected. Playing opposite to Mr. Millarde is Marguerite Courtot, as the sweetheart of the minor league player who muffed a ball at a crucial moment and lost the game and the championship. Henry Hallam is the father of the girl.

Christie Mathewson.

The interest will center on the players of national reputation, who are many times shown close up, and also on the scenes in which are shown the Giants in action. Manager McGraw is much in evidence, rarely full face, but nearly always side face. In this way he avoids any inclination to look at the camera and furthers the illusion as well. The popular Christie Mathewson has much to do, and does it as unconcernedly as if no record were being made of his movements. There are many views of the Giants' training grounds at Marlin, Texas, and of the home grounds in New York.

The story opens at a ball game in Squashville, N. J. Mountjoy Jones, with the score 7 to 4 in favor of the home team and three men on bases, muffs a ball and loses the game. He is denounced by the spectators and later ostracised by the inhabitants of his town. Even his sweetheart snubs him. That night he dreams—and the story really begins right here. It is different when he is asleep. In a game he makes a hit by stopping a drive. He makes a hit not only with the spectators, but also with a scout for the New York League team, who immediately engages him for the big league. He goes on to Marlin Springs and joins the club in its spring warming-up. Later he comes to New York and we see him in the opening game of the season. The coach and the manager give the recruit his final instructions. He is called on as a "pinch hitter," and brings in the decisive run. The reporters interview him. The Squashville local paper tells the story, and Mamie and her father set out for New York to watch the new hero in action. On their arrival they see Mountjoy demonstrating his versatility by playing shortstop. In a tight place Mathewson and the shortstop "frame up" a triple play, the coup is executed, and the recruit is carried from the field on the shoulders of his admirers.

It is about this time that Mountjoy awakes. He sees a letter being pushed under his door. It is from his sweetheart, and informs him that he may call on her, but father says if he mentions baseball out he goes. Mountjoy throws out of the window a ball and a bat.

The picture will be popular with that large element of the population which follows the national game.

The Vitagraph Company has erected a new open air studio adjoining its plant in Brooklyn, N. Y. The dimensions of the stage are 100 feet by 150 feet and the stage can be enclosed when the occasion requires. The building occupies a plot 100 feet by 450 feet and is covered with glass.

THE RETURN OF MISS LAWRENCE.

Some Side Lights on the Personality of a Great Favorite of the Motion Picture Fans.

Lovers and regular patrons of the motion picture entertainment are no doubt speculating already upon the character of the first picture in which Miss Lawrence will appear, now that her return to the field of the camera has been announced by the Universal Company. Up to this writing, the Universal has not given the title of the first picture in which she is to appear, but it is said that she is to be featured in multiple-reel subjects selected especially to suit her peculiar ability and taste. We hope that this is true, for Miss Lawrence, always sparkling and vivacious, has too often been miscast in heavy emotional dramatic parts quite unsuited to her personality.

Miss Florence Lawrence, Who Returns to the Universal Company in Favorite Roles.

Though it is fully a year since Miss Lawrence has played in pictures, she has not been forgotten. She tells of the daily receipt of stacks of letters from her picture friends all over the country solicitous for her welfare and anxious to know when she would come back. Though not in the pictures, Miss Lawrence has not been idle during her retirement. Out of the proceeds of her popularity she and her husband, Harry Solter, purchased a pretty little farm at Rivervale, N. J. It was well stocked with things that grow, both animate and inanimate, and there Miss Lawrence caught the spirit of Nature and became wrapped up in the delights of farm life.

A pretty story is told of her efforts to produce a rose of distinctive character and it is said that she has been successful. But the call of the camera was too strong to remain unheeded and our popular player is to be again with us. Her pictures will be released under the Victor brand of the Universal and will be available in the course of a month or two.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

CINCINNATI Local Number 2, M. P. E. L. of America, recently had passed in that city an ordinance that provides for a graduated, classified license for theaters and motion picture shows, making two classifications for theaters and motion picture shows, and graduating each class according to its seating capacity.

In cases of motion picture shows, $100 is charged for the first 300 seats and $30 for each additional 100 seats, or fraction thereof, per annum. This ordinance saves the members of the league in Cincinnati about $3,250 per annum. It is considered a very just, fair and equitable ordinance, and the graduation, according to the seating capacity, seems to be the most equitable basis for license.

Mr. L. S. Miller, in this case, devoted his efforts in an unselfish way, not in the capacity of a lawyer, but as an exhibitor and a member of the league. This is one of the many things that a local can do, if the proper spirit prevails, and if every member gives his assistance and cooperation.

Mr. Miller is senior member of the firm of Miller & Forster, Cincinnati, attorneys for Cincinnati Local No. 2, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, and general counsel for the Cincinnati Builders' & Traders' Exchange, which represents 230 contracting companies and some of the biggest industries of Cincinnati.

Chicago Pastors Differ Over Merits of M. P. Shows.

Moving picture shows as a means of legitimate amusement for church members were praised and condemned by various speakers at the weekly meeting of the Baptist ministers' conference at the Masonic Temple the other day. The consensus of opinion was that "they are all right if operated properly and along civic uplift lines."

The Rev. D. T. Denman, of Oak Park Baptist Church, the first speaker, said: "Not only our boys and girls like to go to moving picture shows, but our older members are almost equally enthused with such amusement. We do not want to antagonize our young people. I do not believe there is much wrong in these shows, if properly conducted."

The Rev. Gustaf E. Wallendorf, of Elim Swedish Baptist Church, strongly opposed the moving pictures.

"The church and stage," he said, "can in no manner be connected or joined. The devil has laughed at us for spending dollars upon pageants and not a cent for missionary work. The spirit of this meeting makes me sad."

The Rev. C. W. Finwall said he had been on the stage for many years before being converted to the church.

"But few people on the stage are clean," he said. "You are getting our young people away from God by these amusements. There is no room for them in any church."

Dr. Johnston Myers, of Immanuel Baptist Church, defended the moving pictures, saying that he regularly attended them each week and averaged visiting them twice each week.

"I demand some amusement to make me laugh," he said, "and if I do not get this it seems that I would blow up. We are living in a troubled age. Men and women suffer with depression. They need something to arouse them and make them cheerful, and the moving pictures will afford this relief. We are in danger of becoming hypocritical. Moving pictures, if along safe lines, are all right."

It is hard to read the opinions of those who oppose pictures without sharp criticism. Missionary work at home, as wrought by the influence of moving pictures, can well bear comparison with that done abroad by well meaning religious agencies. The devil (whoever he is and however he may laugh) will find in the missionary field richer food for mirth by far than at the moving picture show. The pulpit is not so immaculate that it can afford to stand sponsor for the statement, "Few people on the stage are clean"; and what has this to do with moving pictures anyway? Yes, Mr. Finwall, there is ample room today, in churches like yours, for young people. The truth is, it is difficult to find anything but vacant seats in them. Reach out in the right way and you will get the young people. Why not run occasionally an educational, or a Biblical, subject on Sunday evenings, and spare your congregation that Sunday evening sermon?

Millionaires and the Nickel Show.

Miss Mary Isabel Brush, in a recent article in the Chicago Tribune, under the heading "Newporters go to the Nickel Show," touches humorously on the experiences and surroundings of Mrs. French Vanderbilt, the divorced wife of Alfred S. Vanderbilt, and her guests highly favored by fortune. Mrs. Vanderbilt entertained a party at the local opera house, after a dinner in her Newport cottage, in one of the boxes, at a cost of 50 cents.

"The opera house where this took place is constructed entirely of wood and is as free from upholstery decoration, or any fineness of planning as the usual village amusement theater. Whenever an acrobat is too rheumatic to appear on the regular circuit, whenever a voice is too squeaky to be tolerated elsewhere, whenever a film gets to dropping pictures out of its sequence, they send them to Newport and the smart set flock to see them.

"If only Mr. Hammerstein could collect such Monday night audiences his troubles would be forever over. Wonderfully costumed, they sit in straight-backed chairs almost under the stage and crane their necks upward for two hours. The other night when the heroine stood on a rocky crag looking out to sea, Mrs. Willie K. Vanderbilt inappropriately observed, 'Isn't that the Nicholas Brown place?'

"All of the audience, back to the last row, composed of cooks, laundry hands, and seamen, shrieked with laughter, for so it was. The moving picture men two seasons previous had been hard pressed for a castle in Scotland containing a sunken garden and also a rockbound coast. They appealed to Mrs. Brown for the use of her estate, and she, who is said never to have turned down any request, legitimate or not, that has been made of her, good naturedly let the moving picture men take possession of her grounds at Newport for a week until they had photographed everything, to use her account of it, 'from the day's laundry in the arbor to my guest's baby.' After the spectacle had thrilled audiences all over the world it came back in its decrepit age to help one of the richest audiences ever assembled to pass an evening!"

It will be noticed that these pampered pets of fashion had no kick coming at the deception of the film manufacturer. They discovered risible amusement where others might have sworn. There is something delightful after all in the matter of owning millions.

Construction of Royal Hippodrome Commenced.

Henry Myer, who owns theaters in New York City and Yonkers, is said to have purchased the vacant property at the southeast corner of North Clark Street and Sherman Place, this city. This property lies about a block north of Wrightwood Avenue and about three south of Diversey Parkway, in a neighborhood peopled by substantial citizens. Mr. Myer promises something in connection with his purchase.

The land fronts 200 feet on Clark Street, with a depth of 250 feet, and was owned by Mrs. Augusta Lehmann. The proposed theater, plans for which have been prepared by Architect F. E. Davidson, is to cover the entire frontage and extend back 210 feet to Lehmann court. The interior will contain a main auditorium and a gallery, with a combined seating capacity of about 2,600.

In addition to the theater the building will contain six stores and five apartments, and a large restaurant, and will cost about $200,000. It will be known as the Royal Hippodrome, and a feature will be a pipe organ costing $28,000, in addition to a seventy-five piece symphony unit orchestra.

An innovation will be the devoting of Sunday morning to a free organ recital, while an invitation will be extended to any clergyman to talk for half an hour on any subject except politics.

Work on the new structure will begin in a short time and it is the intention to have it ready for occupancy early in 1914.

Lecturer Hits Fake Pictures.

Liman C. Mann, a well known lecturer on moving pictures in the Middle West, under the date of July 28, writes as follows from East St. Louis, Ill.:

"I desire to express my appreciation of the publication of the article headed 'A Misleading Feature,' on page 519, issue August 2. It might not be a bad idea if your esteemed and valued paper would also brand the three-reel picture called 'Quo Vadis?' as a fake.

"The picture is purely and simply a combination of 'St. George and the Dragon,' Homer's 'Odyssey' and a reel of film supposedly setting forth the life of Saul, or Paul, of Tarsus. A week ago yesterday, the advance man handling these films came into Redmon's Airdrome, this city. After he had booked Mr. Redmon the first four days this week, he made arrangements with me to give the lecture. Although not having seen the pictures, I agreed to do so.

"I worked up my talk. Last night on seeing the picture, I at once realized that the story was not carried out in any way, shape or form and, furthermore, no lecture built around the story itself could be made to fit the picture. I therefore canceled my engagement.

"My name has been mentioned throughout the state in connection with this picture and I desire to say that the only arrangement made by me with the owners was to lecture the four days I have mentioned.

"I would greatly appreciate it if you would be kind enough to give space to this in your next issue of the 'Bible of motion picturedom.'"

THEY "ROCKED" OUR "POP" ROCK.

When the delegation of New England exhibitors visited the Vitagraph plant something more than a year ago, they exacted a promise from "Pop" William T. Rock that he would play a return date at some future time. It was in keeping of that promise that "Pop," accompanied by Mrs. Rock, made a trip over to Boston on July 21. The gang was waiting for "Pop" and on the following day they took him down to Nahant. What happened took place at the Hotel Breton, Bass Point. The accompanying photograph contains the likenesses of the survivors—those able to face the camera after the deck was cleared.

The feature of the affair was a dinner to "Pop." A beautifully decorated dining table was spread in the hotel dining-room. At "Pop's" place was placed a great rock weighing four or five hundred pounds, upon which his name had been painted. At the places of the other guests were smaller rocks and upon all of these "Pop" was obliged to write his name. It was some "rocky" affair as many of the party thought next morning. Among those present were: Frank J. Howard, Harry T. Wasserman, J. P. Butler, W. R. Scates, S. A. Louis, Joseph Mack, Ernest H. Horstman, F. H. Vine, Glover Ware, N. L. Demara, Jacob Lourie, John B. Rock, J. S. Kittredge, J. J. Cahill, Walter I. King, R. D. Marson.

"A Child of the Sea" (Selig)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

AN excellent story by Edward McWade, one of compelling interest and unusual development, is furnished picture theater-goers in Selig's two-reel feature, "A Child of the Sea," that will be released August 18. The story is really so meritorious that one is captiously inclined to blame the producer for not having told it better than he has done, although his work is by no means weak. We cannot forgive him, however, for the lack of those essentials that contribute to realism in the scenes that are supposed to impress the beholder as being disasters at sea, although we are inclined to overlook this defect when viewing the remarkable light effects in the lighthouse, as the great lens revolves and throws its light far out over the angry waters.

Everybody will be glad to welcome that fair favorite, Miss Kathlyn Williams, in this feature subject. The ease with which this capable actress transforms herself from the role of matron to that of a budding girl, still in her teens, is a pretty display of art. The love scenes in which the sylph-like maiden appears are invested with a delicious reserve and tenderness, quite in strong contrast with those other stirring scenes, where she fights for mastery and where life itself is at stake.

I wonder how many of the people who view these films will recognize in Al. W. Filson, who appears as Captain Warren, the star in "A Tip on the Derby," a high-class vaudeville sketch that contributed to the mirth of hundreds of thousands of people nearly twenty years ago. Al. and his good wife, then known as Filson and Errol, were much sought after in those days and were the most popular topliners in the business. Although rich, Al. cannot keep away from the boards and, like the progressive that he is, he takes a particular zest in doing his stunts before the camera. It is needless to say that Mr. Filson's Captain Warren is a strong characterization.

Harold Lockwood is to be complimented for his acting in the likeable role of Bill Jackson, the lover of the heroine of the story, and Herbert Rawlinson carries off honors in the part of Jim Arnold, the villainous young fisherman. Strong characters also are Tom Lawton, the lighthouse keeper, and his wife, in the care of Wm. Hutchinson and Miss Lillian Hayward. And little Baby Lillian; we leave her to the last because she is the sweetest, and always her sunny little self.

Captain Warren, master of a merchantman, takes his wife and baby along on one of his cruises. In a terrific storm his ship is disabled, and he is deserted by his crew, who take all the boats when they depart. He places his wife and child on an improvised raft, with the hope that they may be saved, and chooses to remain with his vessel until the end. He is rescued by a passing ship, while his wife and daughter are pulled ashore by a lighthouse keeper and his wife. These good people discover that the mother has died from exposure, and they adopt the child of the sea as their daughter.

"The Lovers"—from Selig's "A Child of the Sea."

Fifteen years pass and the little waif has developed into a beautiful girl, affectionate and devoted. The lighthouse keeper and his wife have grown frail, and Bill Jackson, a handsome, strapping young fellow, has been hired as assistant. He and Nell Warren learn to love each other, much to the mortification of Jim Arnold, a young fisherman, who has determined to win Nell for himself. The girl spurns him and he plans revenge.

About this time Captain Warren is appointed lighthouse superintendent of that part of the coast which includes the promontory on which Nell and her friends live. He had long since given up hope that his wife and baby lived, after a search that lasted for years.

Soon after his appointment, he received an anonymous letter, charging that Tom Lawton, the lighthouse keeper, was crippled, that his helper, Bill Jackson, was a drunkard and that the light was not being attended to. This letter was written by Jim Arnold. Captain Warren immediately set out in his launch to investigate.

The old lighthouse keeper on the same day, seeing signs of an approaching storm, instructed Bill Jackson to be careful in seeing that the light was kept in particularly fine order. On his way to the lighthouse Bill was waylaid by Jim Arnold and felled with a bludgeon. Nell was a witness to the crime, and guessing Arnold's object, rushed to a boat and pulled for dear life to the lighthouse. Arnold spied her and followed in another boat, hoping to get there first. Nell succeeded in beating him by a neck and the great light shone out brightly, while she held Arnold pinned under the trap door leading to the tower.

In this position Nell and the villainous fisherman are found later by Captain Warren and the old lighthouse keeper. By means of a locket which Nell wore Captain Warren discovered that she was his long lost daughter. On learning that she was engaged to Bill Jackson, he gave them his blessing.

Studio Efficiency.

Scientific Management as Applied to the Lubin Western Branch by Wilbert Melville.

BY the introduction of an "efficiency" system of management throughout the entire plant, Wilbert Melville, producer-manager of the Western branch of the Lubin Manufacturing Company, at Los Angeles, California, has set an example which, sooner or later, other motion picture manufacturers throughout the world must follow if they wish to meet competition and survive.

Wilbert Melville.

Scientific management as applied to the motion picture business is something new. The new industry came into existence so quickly and grew so fast that those engaged in it have been too busy to study the commercial side of it scientifically. Nearly all the improvements which have been made since the beginning have been along technical and artistic lines, and consequently, while many manufacturers are turning out excellent productions, nearly all of them are doing so at the expense of terrific waste in money and effort.

The chief value of the new policy which Mr. Melville has put into execution is that it makes possible the production of pictures of high quality while effecting substantial economies of money—and of time, which is often of greater importance than money.

The changes which have been brought about under Mr. Melville's administration have affected every department of the Western branch. An analysis of the method would reveal the fact that it consists in the perfection of details. In the first place the relative locations of the buildings were determined with a view to the part they play in the general scheme. Those which are most used in connection with the work on the stage are grouped around the stage. To use a homely illustration, when a producer goes into the studio to make a scene he finds everything as conveniently placed for him as does a housekeeper in a well-planned kitchen. There is no time or effort wasted because the property room, for example, is located remote from the stage.

Practically all the money-saving and trouble-saving devices which have been introduced into the Lubin Western branch have been originated by Mr. Melville, but one of the most valuable ideas originated at the Philadelphia studio of the company and has since been adopted bodily at the Western branch. This is the method of dealing with the scenario problem. As at the Philadelphia studio, so also at the Western branch, a separate editorial department has been installed for the handling of scenarios. Will M. Ritchey, until his connection with the Western branch, city editor of the Los Angeles Express, is at the head of the department. All of the scripts are prepared for the directors in such shape that they can be produced as written. This does not mean that a script is handed to a director without any regard to his abilities or his individual ideas or talents. On the contrary there are usually many consultations between the editorial department and the director who is to produce the script before it is finally delivered.

This is only one of a number of changes which have been made for the purpose of relieving the directors of detail and routine which ordinarily are a handicap against the highest artistic results. The three directors who are now producing have nothing to do but devote all their attention and energies to making better and finer pictures. Each director has his own property man, under his direction, who for several days before a picture is begun is engaged in obtaining the properties which are to be used. Meanwhile the director is left absolutely free, for as many days as necessary, to select the locations for the exterior scenes, and to arrange with the scenic artists for the building of the studio sets.

In the business department careful cost data is kept, segregated for each picture, so that it is possible, at any time, to ascertain what the pictures are costing and, by comparison, to tell which methods are wasteful and which are profitable. It does not mean that the excellence of the product has been allowed to suffer in the slightest degree in order to produce more profit; on the contrary, by stopping leaks and detecting extravagant and ineffective methods, it has been found possible to get more intelligent and immeasurably more satisfactory results.

Mr. Melville, the originator of the plan, has been perfecting it for a number of years. The beginning of the system was laid a number of years ago when he reorganized the Solax company's studio during the time he was manager of it. Mr. Lubin took him from the Solax company and for a time he produced pictures in the Philadelphia studio and at Washington. Then he took a Lubin company to Arizona for nearly a year and last December was sent to Los Angeles with a complete company to organize the Western branch.

EDUCATIONAL RESULTS FROM THE EXPOSITION.

Now that the first exposition has become a matter of history, the universal question as to the results will be asked in all directions. The first, from the educational standpoint, is the published statement that certain screens were in much demand by inquirers from scholastic institutions. Of course this means that these same people are looking for other parts of the necessary equipment; the screen, however, is of a permanent or "fixture" nature and the best all-round one is especially being inquired for.

Only a short time ago it was customary to notice the individual additions of any school or church to the ranks of those using the moving picture; this is no longer being done; to continue to do so would be to publish an unnecessary space-taking list, the numbers are now becoming so large. The use of school auditoriums for Saturday evening exhibitions is now quite frequent; the fact that the use of the picture in the class-room is not yet thoroughly possible has not deterred many from making as much a beginning as is possible. In church work the picture is now quite general, and because there is no needed curriculum the churches are able to make more immediate use of the picture than the day school.

Inquiries among exhibitors at the exposition brought out the fact that the moving picture trade was now by no means confined to the picture houses and exhibitors; so general has the trade become, that ministers, school authorities and principals, commercial houses and private individuals are in large numbers daily among the inquiring correspondents of the trade at large. This stupendous growth is the basic warrant for the first exposition which proved really only a timely answer to a demand which was apparent to only a few, but proved real to many.

S. S. HUTCHINSON AND FAMILY IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. and Mrs. S. S. Hutchinson and their two sons, Winston and Hobard, arrived by motor from Los Angeles and will remain in Santa Barbara until September. They are at the Arlington. Their colored chauffeur did remarkably well for his first coast experience with a new machine. They came by way of the Casitas and no trouble was experienced.

Mr. Hutchinson will devote much of his attention immediately to the production of special features. Mrs. Hutchinson and the boys were given their first view of the new studio by moonlight. As time permits, the entire family will indulge in more or less touring, and a trip to San Francisco, with stops at important points, is in prospect.

The younger son was named after Winston Churchill, the author, at the time he was becoming a literary light. The Hutchinsons are not acquainted with the author, but were great admirers of his works.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

"I'LL be glad when the summer is at an end," remarked a director at one of the leading studios. "No," he continued, "I am not tired of the attractions and pastimes of the season; I have had little time to devote to them. It is in the summer time that we do most of our work outside in this city and vicinity, and the directors, as a rule, have little time to devote to pleasure. We manage to squeeze in a few hours for recreation between Saturday afternoon and Monday morning. My wish for the summer to come to a close is created by a desire to get rid of the sight-seeing visitors at the studio. Nothing is more foreign to my intentions than a desire to be discourteous, but I cannot refrain from stating that visiting studios by the country people coming to New York in the summer time has become a source of much worriment on the part of directors. At almost all studios there is a rule that, unless properly accredited, visitors are barred. This means that only people connected with journalism, the motion picture business, or people of prominence in some sphere, and friends of the studio employees are extended the courtesies. The latitude is a broad one, particularly when it applies to people connected with the business, such as exhibitors, members of their families and friends."

* * *

"It is a necessary evil," continued the director. "It would not be business policy to withhold the courtesy from those I have referred to. No matter how many explanations may be made, an exhibitor cannot be persuaded that a withholding of the courtesy from himself or those accredited by him is justifiable. The out-of-town sightseers flock to the cities in the good old summer time, and the result is that scores of visitors present themselves for admission to the 'mysterious precincts' of the motion picture making plants; and on days when the directors have in hand the largest and most important productions the visiting is the most noticeable."

* * *

Pressed for a bill of particulars as to the actual effect of the visits the director asked the interviewer to imagine himself a director with a big rehearsal on hand. Nervous and apprehensive on account of the responsibility upon him, and suffering from the heat of the day, intensified by the rays of the sun beating upon the glass roof and sides of the studio, the director finds an additional handicap in trying to make his people forgetful of the presence of strangers. It may not be known by many outside the profession that motion picture actors and actresses, or most of them, are nervous and unsettled when rehearsing in the presence of visiting strangers. They are opposed to public rehearsals for many reasons best known to the profession and there is danger at times that the people will not put the vim, or "punch" as some call it, into their parts when they are at work under ordinary conditions. To try and get his people to overcome the feelings created by the presence of strangers and put real work into the scenes makes the work of the director the more difficult; and it is not surprising that at times some productions reflect an apparent oversight on the part of a director. This naturally comes to the notice of the critics and the poor director is put on the carpet.

Continuing his talk the director said, "If visitors to studios constituted only journalists and people directly connected with the motion picture business there would not be so much reason for reference to the subject. The former have an insight that enables them to use good judgment, and the same may be said of a majority of the latter. It is the friend who looks upon the making of moving pictures as a pastime rather than a task that is the thorn in the director's side. Some cannot get close enough to a scene, and at times a director is on the verge of apoplexy, fearing that the thoughtless visitor will step in range of the camera at some critical stage of a scene. Oh, yes, such a mishap may be remedied in a moment by a repetition of that part of the scene, but such incidents at times unnerves the director and his people, and to get the original effect rehearsal may be in order again. In addition to this the director who is trying to save time and expense on a production has visions of a court-martial.

"See some of the actors and actresses and I am quite sure they will agree with what I have said regarding studio visits. I am inclined to think that the company should set aside certain days in a month as visiting days and the visits should be restricted to an inspection of the plants as far as possible. This does not mean that studio work should be suspended on such days. Commonplace work could be done and arrangements could be made to do outside work as much as possible on the dates set aside for visitors. I really believe it is a mistake to have studio work done in the presence of uninitiated visitors. I may be mistaken, but I am of the opinion that people who are interested in motion pictures only as patrons of the theater lose impressions favorable to the business after they have seen studio work. Before securing the privilege they have an enthusiasm that wanes after the visit. I have observed this; at least I got that impression from subsequent remarks made by visitors. It leaves the same feeling of disappointment that the susceptible maidens and young men get after a personal meeting with some of the players to whom they have become attached by watching their screen appearances."

Taking the tip, the interviewer asked some players to give their impressions on the subject of studio visiting and found a decided sentiment in accord with the director. "Of course," said one player, "we look upon the visitors as our friends and we try at all times to greet them cordially, but it is very hard at times to maintain that spirit, particularly when you are up against a visitor who never knows when it is time to break away and you have work to do. Many of them do not seem to realize that we actually work. They seem to think that when we are in scenes we are enjoying ourselves as we do when at some social event, or otherwise pleasure seeking. The dear souls come here and throw themselves about our necks, embrace and kiss us, and tell us how long they have admired us. You cannot help being nice to them; and yet, at times, they create a feeling of resentment by undue anxiety for particulars of a personal nature. The director is right when he says many of us are opposed to working in the presence of strangers. When we are in parts we try to live them and it is not easy to do this when some visitors are present. This may be better understood by illustration. Should an audience display amusement when a performer is in a serious part? It creates a loss of balance that frequently brings about a fizzle. I remember an occasion when it became necessary to request an injudicious visitor to withdraw from a studio. I favor the visiting day idea."

An out-of-town exhibitor when told of the comments on studio visiting said: "We appreciate that such visits must be annoyances at times, although we are responsible for many of them. But what can we do? Good patrons of our houses who are about to visit the cities come to us for credentials, which we are bound to give them as a matter of business. They tell us they are dying for an opportunity to see how the pictures are made and if we do not help them in that direction they become patrons of some exhibitor who will. We can help the manufacturers if they will give us information that will enable us to tell our patrons that visits to studios are allowed only at certain hours on fixed days. I think that would diminish the visits, as many people would perhaps not be able to follow the schedule."

Moving Picture Educator

THE EDUCATIONAL PICTURE DISCUSSED.

By Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

Friendly House, Davenport, Iowa.

WE have just received from Mr. Harry E. Downer, of Friendly House, Davenport, Iowa, the following letter in which he enclosed a copy of a paper that he read before the Contemporary Club, of Davenport, last April. The letter speaks for itself and the paper is so good that we should like to print it all, but cannot take the space and so must content ourselves with giving some extracts of the best parts. The letter says:

> It so happened that at the time we at Friendly House were more than usually interested in motion pictures there came a vacancy in the annual program of the Contemporary Club, which was filled by a discussion on motion photography, introduced, encouraged and confused by me. It seemed like a good opportunity to interest in this matter sundry influential people of this locality, the club membership including Bishop Morrison and Dean Hare, an ex-congressman, a former member of the supreme bench of Iowa, and other thoughtful people. The notes afterwards put in shape for the published annual proceedings emerge in the form of the enclosure. I cannot hope that you will find anything new therein. There will be some statements with which you will disagree, if you find time to read all of it. I do not believe that educational pictures will succeed commercially unless their merit is demonstrated to the general public by philanthropy. The impression created by the exploitation of the pictures of the baser sort makes necessary the creation of a demand for the better pictures by a propaganda that will not be financed from the box-office. The box-office, I take it, is very well satisfied with present conditions. The wholesome picture will come into its own some time, no doubt, without the aid of its friends. I am hoping, however, that this time may be hastened so that it will not be synchronous with my (departure hence).
> Our screen is dark until October shall bring the children in from the outdoors which is much better for them than the delightful pictures they enjoy so much.

We regret that we have had to put into brackets our own phrasing of one clause in Mr. Downer's letter as his actual wording is, we are sure quite unintentionally, such that a clergyman could not pass its flippancy unrebuked. We have found several new things in his paper and our points of difference are more academic than practical so we shall not comment on them here, except to say that we think he is making the common mistake of a great many thinkers and dealing too much in generalities that are not based upon a sufficiently exhaustive examination of particulars. We should like him to give us definitions, both intensive and extensive, of what he means by "pictures of the baser sort," by "the better pictures" and by "the wholesome picture," telling us not only what the phrases denote but also what they connote. We feel pretty certain we have a correct idea of what he means by them, but we think that if he will try to formulate the definitions for himself he will get a much more accurate idea about some things in the picture business before he has finished.

Mr. Downer's Paper.

The title of the paper is "The Wholesome Mission of Motion Pictures," but it covers a good deal more ground than is indicated by the title. The first ten pages deal with the attitude of the better class of people towards the motion picture and the causes and reasons for the present censorship agitation; the next six pages deal with the title; then come six pages on the various uses of the picture in actual employment for educational purposes and by educators; then two pages on his own hobby, the enlistment of philanthropy in establishing free or low rental educational film exchanges, and he closes with a quotation from the Moving Picture World's Christmas message. The following quotations are substantially a summary of what he has to say upon his first topic:

> "Science subtracted the one-thirty-second portion of a second from the one-twenty-fourth part, and upon that remainder, a fleeting fraction of a fragment of time, built a delightful means of recreation, a graphic influence in education, a splendid force for moral and wholesome life."
> "But what is there upon the motion picture ribbon? Almost everything, pretty much anything, an insufferable deal of nothing."
> "When it is permitted by educators, cinematography will prove itself a powerful and revolutionizing agency of enlightenment. (But) it is easy to see that motion pictures may incur the condemnation of criminologists and that motion pictures may elicit the praise of scientists and social students. It all depends. Any single film may be either good or evil, educative or pointless. It may be informational, beautiful, an inspirer of holy emotions, or it may be debasing, destructive, criminal—it all depends upon the message it brings and the emotions it inspires."
> "At this time motion pictures are under the condemnation of a large portion of the thoughtful and intelligent people of this country." (He then shows how this condemnation originated in the character of the early pictures and the early theaters.) "These films disappeared long since, but the blight they brought hangs over motion pictures still. . . . Now that the ill-smelling, uncomfortable, make-shift theaters have been displaced by auditoriums of comfort and even elegance, the prejudice against the motion picture theater remains, as thoughtless and self-sufficient as any other prejudice."
> "The condemnation of the judicious comes also from the character of the films shown in many of the theaters and the offensive advertising at the theater entrance."
> (Again) "Motion pictures are strongly commercialized, and it is not strange that men are engaged in manufacture, distribution and projection who care nothing for the present moral influence or future business success of this great social force. These men (look) no farther ahead than a possible harvest of vicious nickels, . . . in opposition to the general present reputation and future prosperity of an enterprise in which many men of sound business principles and philanthropic ideals are engaged. These enemies to the great usefulness of cinematography violate the first aphorism of showmen, 'Cater to the good people of the earth. The other kind have no money.' . . . (And) The evil in the very small percentage of such films projected brings condemnation upon all motion pictures in the minds of many who have not forgotten the early days. Then comes the search for remedy."
> "The legislature of Saskatchewan, having in mind the rancid picture, recently debated the plan of raising the license fee of motion picture theatres from $20 per annum to $300, and limiting them to one to every 5,000 of the population. The most common appeal by those who would keep the theater clean is to censorship. This plan, borrowed from Russia, un-American, . . . recommends itself strongly to those who can see no means by which the reputable and admirable purveyors of pictures can restrain the depraved and mendacious in the business. . . . All the states have laws which would cover all offenses. . . . But, after all, prevention is better than punishment any day, and, moreover, the correction of the law is sometimes haltingly applied. Then, in addition, what campaign of fine and imprisonment can erase from the mind and heart of the child the blackness left by an evil film? It may be Russian, and it may be an assault upon the personal liberty of those who have forfeited the right to liberty of any sort, but censorship looks good to most people. It at least acts before the harm is done, when too often the law acts not at all." (Then follow accounts of several flagrant instances in which the law failed to act and descriptions of the Detroit and London censorship schemes.)
> "Conscienceless picture makers have invited the regulation which is falling upon them. The other sort have nothing to fear, except that men of worth and reputation will suffer with the guilty if statewide censorship be applied, with a schedule for fees for inspection and the inevitable expensive entry into politics."
> "Motion picture people should not wonder at the spread of the appeal to censorship. It seems like the readiest weapon for protection against a menace new and serious. Commercialized amusements must expect police regulation in the interests of decency. Taking into consideration the stuff which motion picture people have put before the public, censorship is but searching a vagrant at the police station for deadly weapons. . . . The evil motion picture out-parallels in the menace of its influence any output of the printing press, for which state laws and United States statutes have been provided. The pictured story is perfectly apparent to those so ignorant they cannot read. Where one reads a book, many see the picture in a nickel theater."

The above is well worthy the careful consideration of every one in the picture business as it is a careful statement of the other side by one of the other side and from their viewpoint. There are several things, however, in the statement that we should like to comment upon in the interests of justice. In the first place we do not think that the condemnation of the picture is so general nor so sweeping as Mr. Downer states. His statement is quite true as regards conditions as late even as a year ago, but today, the condemnation is, except in particular localities, much more discriminating and fair. Mr. Downer has said nothing, probably because he knew nothing, about the efforts made and the results obtained by the many exhibitors all over the country who have been sedulously catering to and trying to interest the better elements in their respective communities. The work of these men in the past eighteen months or so has wrought a radical change in the general opinion of the educated element in the country at large and except in certain localities which would regard Philadelphia as a wide-awake hustling town and still think that Lee and

Grant are sitting under the apple-tree at Appomatox, the criticisms made by educated and thoughtful persons about the pictures are not against them as a whole, but against particular pictures or with regard to certain noxious elements in various classes of pictures and half the time the criticisms are accompanied with more or less sensible and practical suggestions for improvement.

Mr. Downer does not define what he means by the "evil picture" nor the picture of bad character which causes the 'condemnation of the judicious" and this is really the weak point in his argument as we cannot help but think, in view of what he says later on as to his experience in visiting the Davenport theaters, that he has allowed himself to be influenced too much by ideas derived from back reading and from disappearing conditions. Today the vicious picture is the exception not the rule nor even the ordinary. There is plenty that is inane, more that is coarse and common, much that is pointless, but the great majority of pictures are clean and wholesome from a moral point of view and the standard is improving every day. The immoral picture is rapidly being killed in this country not because of the laws and statutes and censorship regulations against it, but by the silent condemnation of the American public which holds the highest standard of morality of any nation in the world and simply will not, even the uneducated and common and vulgar portions of it, stand for that kind of picture or that kind of exhibitor. As Mr. Downer himself says regarding one of the instances which he cites as justifying censorship, "The human turkey buzzard who presided over this palace of joy is now in another line of business and the building devoted to other uses." We can give him a hundred other instances exactly parallel if he wants them.

Censorship.

As Mr. Downer says, censorship is Russian and un-American, and we must congratulate him on having made out an excellent brief for that plank in his "party platform." His words, however, have the ring of a man who is fighting from motives of loyalty for something that he himself does not personally believe in and, while we admire him for his loyalty to his party, we cannot help but suggest that he would do both it and the pictures a much greater service if he would convince his community that censorship is not only a futile weapon but a boomerang as well. It may seem like the readiest weapon for protection but appearances are more often than not deceitful and in this case they are certainly so. The "expensive entry into politics" is bad enough; but the making of innocent men suffer with the guilty is worse. It is as bad as the condemnation of Christ by the high-priest Caiaphas. It is far better that a whole nation perish than that one innocent man should be made to suffer unjustly. An innocent man has the right to offer himself as a vicarious sacrifice for a guilty person, but it is an invention of the devil and a slap in the face of God to make him do so. This on Mr. Downer's own showing is what censorship does and the nation or community that adopts that principle is like the Jews who condemned Christ or imperial Rome in the early Christian days, already debauched and degraded and on the road to dissolution. Speaking of censorship, Mr. Downer says: "It is well for the judicious to keep partially awake." We would mildly suggest that it is bad for them not to keep wholly awake.

The Mission of the Picture.

Mr. Downer continues, after quoting from Mark Twain, Professor Frederick Starr of the University of Chicago, and an article of Mr. Louis Reeves Harrison in the Moving Picture World:

> "It must be remembered that the motion picture theater is the amusement pace of the poor, that it cannot thrive under arbitrary limitation or high license, as planned in Saskatchewan. . . . (Most of those that attend the theaters) can afford no other attendance upon the theater; recreation is as necessary to the soul as bread to the body; improvement in the character of the pictures shown is possible; there is much good in the pictures now shown; the utilization of motion pictures is in its infancy and needs fostering guidance and not sweeping condemnation and extirpation."
> "The ordinary motion picture as at present projected in the customary photo-theater is designed to satisfy tired people. The print is pica, the points pikestaffian. The colors are those of the circus parade, red and blue and yellow. Its virtue is very virtuous, its villainy baldly cussed. The appeal of such pictures is to those who daily pass the open doors of the public library, unaware and without regret. And yet this same picture story of pointless narrative keyed to elemental taste, this story advertised by screaming, squalling bad taste in posters at the door, is the basis of great hopes for the future. Taste can be cultivated. Poor stories can gain point and grace and fervor. Crude dramas can be bettered until they are good. The motion picture has captured popular favor, and with it people may advance to higher planes of emotion, to better appreciation of selection in plot and incident, and then to even favor some portion of culture and education in the evening of pictures now given solely to a pleasant process of killing time. This is the wholesome mission of the motion picture—to furnish clean recreation, and at the same time bring education and culture to all the people.

Quite true Mr. Downer, but we cannot see how you can say it after what you have already said in your paper about the evil influence of many pictures except on one hypothesis, namely that you believe that all places of amusement should be consciously as well as actually educative. If this is so we flatly and entirely disagree with you. Such a principle turns play into work and "all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy" just as much as "all play and no work makes Jack a mere Turk." Most emphatically we must protest against making the ordinary motion picture theater into a schoolroom or lecture hall. We do believe in making it an up-lifting and educative institution, but not at the expense of the poor man's recreation. In the ordinary picture theater, the educational element should be and ought to be a sugar-coated pill. The spectator should be conscious only of his enjoyment of the picture not that he is being taught something. Without doubt the worthy judicious ones who wish to make the poor man's pleasure a kind of kindergarten game that will always teach him something, are the people "and wisdom will die with them;" but nearly thirty years of actual experience in more than one field of educational work has taught us a few things too and we speak whereof we know and of that which we have tested and proved true, when we say that by turning amusements into work the educator defeats his own ends because he lessens the capacity and ability of his pupil to learn and he at the same time throws away the powerful educational means that is inherent in the unconscious influence of pleasure. Mr. Downer is quite right in saying that the wholesome mission of the motion picture is to furnish clean recreation, but it must be recreation, not instruction. Keep your teaching to the school and lecture room and your theaters for recreation; and if you want to uplift the spectators in the theaters help the exhibitor in your town to run the cleanest and most popular amusement place in the community.

Picture Theaters in Davenport.

Mr. Downer then goes on to tell his experience as chairman of a tri-city committee of the social service club which investigated and reported on the character of the pictures shown in Davenport. He says:

> Conditions were found to be uniformly admirable, the pictures above condemnation, the audiences orderly, employes courteous. . . . It is impossible to be otherwise than enthusiastic over this new social force which reaches more people annually than these three instrumentalities for social betterment—church, school, social settlement. From personal observation and the experience of other motion picture patrons, it seems certain that most Davenport photoplay houses try to offer pictures of wholesome character and commendable tendency. (He then goes on to criticize the "extravagant, witless, revolver-waving 'western' type of picture," the "many crude and unnecessary narrations of the eternal triangle," the "silly stories of love-making, swift, coarse and repellant." Finally, he makes a protest against the many death scenes. As he says truly), "Death is always dramatic, but there is danger that the future picture audience will regard the supreme tableau of life much as would a state convention of undertakers. Some of the motion pictures now under popular consumption outeastlynne and outuncletom anything the deathbed drama has offered for the weeping consideration of the handkerchief brigade."
> "To sum up the present status of the motion picture as locally viewed—a small fraction vicious, a larger portion wholesome and instructive, the greater part unimportant and sposhy, ephemeral, meant to last a day and fall into the discard. Those who would appreciate pictures ranking in value with the output of the public library do not attend the photo theater. Some day they will."

Mr. Downer then goes on to describe George Kleine's catalog of educational pictures, Mr. Edison's predictions as to the educational possibilities of the picture, Mr. Collier's ideas about their development in educational work and concludes with a resumé of the uses to which the pictures have already been actually put by educators. His last paragraph is:

> "Just one more farewell before the clash of argument, this time in the words of the Christmas message of the Moving Picture World, a trade paper, and much more than that—the constant champion of the beneficent and wholesome features of motion pictures: 'Three great milestones stand out on humanity's way to progress and knowledge—the alphabet nearest to the cradle of the race, the movable type, and now the motion picture. We believe the motion picture to be the greatest of the three forces mentioned. The alphabet and the movable type rest under the evil spell wrought at the Tower of Babel, where the speech of mankind suffered confusion. The motion picture is free from such hindrance; it transcends and conquers the limitations of the spoken and printed word. Let all friends of the picture stand together in unwearied efforts to make the new art and industry a force for truth and righteousness; let the pictures give us a portrayal of right living and thinking; let them become a medium of clean and helpful amusement and entertainment and a beneficent influence in the lives of all the people.' "

ESSANAY RELEASE DATES CHANGED.

The release dates for Essanay multiple subjects have been changed to Fridays. The first two-reel subject, "Alkali Ike's Gal," will be released August 15th, instead of the 8th, which was reported last week. "The Power of Conscience" will be released Friday, August 22nd. Essanay will release a two-reel feature every Friday, on and after August 15th.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Advertising Pays.

HERE are some extracts from letters from a newspaper man who is going to wind up by having a house of his own. It throws light on one phase of getting business that is as applicable to most other places as it is to the fairly large town where this correspondent lives.

Recently this newspaper man became interested in the efforts of a newcomer to get along. It appears that after the helping hand had been given for a while the exhibitor felt able to toddle along for a time and so the newsman turned his attention to another house. Here is part of the first adventure:

> Have just closed up with my exhibitor. Took hold just a little less than three weeks ago and think I have done fairly well. Had one dark day on account of non-arrival of films and his biggest day's attendance had been under 400—house capacity 590. I think he was averaging $15 to $20 a day gross with expenses close to $50. Told me he couldn't last a week longer and would give me anything I asked if I'd straighten him out. I knew as little as he, but I knew how to find out. I took him on those terms because I didn't know what I could do. First week I was hampered by a new, all-feature agreement he had made, so really I have had only two weeks at it. Had him paying expenses within ten days of the first start. Wednesday of this week he played to 500 afternoon and 700 evening. Yesterday, using six inches of advertising in three papers (2 inches each), I pulled him 699 afternoon and 960 evening. On non-advertising days he's running along $60 to $75 a day. Yesterday he said—with his house jammed in the afternoon and a crowd waiting for a whack at the second show—that he thought he could have done it just the same without advertising. So I said try it a week. This afternoon—Saturday's the best day here, even in summer—he had about 300 there.

Then came a shift because the exhibitor thought that $50 was too much for the service he was getting from the business maker and even refused to see $25. He thought the business would have come anyhow and went it alone. The business builder went to another house and later writes:

> My little friend with the 250 house did 400 business Sunday night on six inches advertising with Blanche Bates films a year old—and had two full houses Monday afternoon. No returns on evening yet. Beats any business he's done this summer by several hundred—had 40 last Monday P. M. against about 400 this week. And yet they can't see how it pays them to sink six or eight dollars in advertising.
> My steady is playing to about three hundred this P. M. with Reliance's "Tangled Web" and no advertising. Last Wednesday, nine inches and 500 afternoon and 600 evening. And ten days ago, on a Sunday, about 600 people went dippy over Cummings and Theby in Ashes—and didn't know they were coming back today. Well, I should worry.

Five Cent Dimes Are Cheap.

There's the proposition. One live hustler did equally well with two houses. When he left the first its business dropped. When he took the second the business went up.

This is the clear, unvarnished record of accomplishment in a small town. The third chapter will be written presently when the boomer will go to a large house and have his permanent business residence there. His letters are not braggart, he is not in search of personal advertising, but he knows us and knows our interest in advertising matters and he has written these letters, not for publication, but because he has some thoughts on the matter that he wanted to get out of his system and so he sat down and chatted with us because he knew that we were in sympathy with his ideas.

The figures show that increased attendance follows intelligent advertising. It stops when the advertising is discontinued. If the advertising costs $6 and brings in $12, it shows a profit of 100 per cent., and that is a pretty good investment. The moral is obvious.

The Junk Question.

We are always willing to argue, but we're willing to let the other fellow argue, too, if he wants to, and we give this space to a Kansas City man, who makes a noise like an exchange. He writes:

> Having taken an ardent interest in the growth of the picture business as it has trailed along two years behind the world I have naturally taken interest in all departments of your paper. Fully realizing that I am the aggressor and will duly receive the just rebukes properly heaped on such as we are, yet let me acknowledge, I can't see the joke. This letter comes from a city of 250,000 population and the first, second and third run houses boast of splendid shows. But—here is the vital point—I can point to a commercial program that is in every way superior to the "splendid" first run. Commercial film is not necessarily punk. Some exchanges render perfect perforation, photography, etc., unpresentable in a very few weeks while another exchange can furnish commercial reels, clean steady and they can be projected steady and clear. Some companies furnish the exchange rotten photography and bad perforation. Now comes my argument that the thing to do is to forget this babble about "Commercial" and look to your exchange, equipment and last and most important your operator who can make 90-day service look good or first run look rotten. In the course of my observations I have encountered and can point to the town of 40,000 wherein the commercial show is netting the manager a neat bank roll and the spick and span 10 day larger house is losing money and the answer can be found at the exchange and in the operating room. Your audience comes to find enjoyment and not to find the age of your service. Proper patches slip through a modern well kept machine without a hitch or jump and a scratch will scarcely be found that will show if the film is clean. As for the whole scene missing I have yet to find a case of this kind from an observant exchange that does not buy from a market that peddles such rotten stuff that it tears all to pieces.
> I cannot take the stand of an exhibitor as I am not in the business at present but will be soon. Neither am I making a pull in favor of a group of operators, but here is my theory and I have made it work. The proper exchange, the proper equipment and the proper operator.
>
> I believe that fifty per cent. of the picture theaters handled in the right way would win fifty per cent. more satisfied customers, at fifty per cent. less film rent, providing they be situated to secure service from the exchange that is wide enough awake to employ inspectors who can make a patch with cement instead of chewing gum and sense enough to cut out a frame instead of a scene. Then they can keep it clean and the "real" operator with a "real" machine kept in the right shape can put on a fifty per cent, better picture than the slip-shod first run house. And for this the manager will gladly pay more than starvation wages to the operator for he can afford to.
> Most exhibitors start backwards—they build the house then buy the machine—then hire a boy to turn it—then rent so many reels a night. My idea is to find out what kind of service the exchange offers, then hunt up an operator that can put on a picture; then you are in a position to build your theater and also a position to make it go and in most cases, in fact, I'll bank on ninety per cent., you'll not pay for one to three-day service but will show sixty to ninety films and have a better picture and more satisfied customers than your competitor with the "first run boast" and an expense he can't meet on dull occasions. I claim that somewhere in every town, large or small, you can make money and friends with commercial films and that you don't have to slip the film to the 800 population just because it happens to be more than four days' old.

On the Other Hand.

We imagine our correspondent feels better with all that load off his chest, but we still think that there is a joke with a moral in the statement that cutting down the exchange bill saves only tickets that might otherwise be sold. We've seen a lot of junk shows between here and the time we started looking at pictures back in 1896, and we must confess that we still have a preference for good clean stuff. Of course it may be that there is an occasional exchange that can supply a good looking service of thirty days and over, but when it comes to a statement like that we are from the same state as the Kansas City man. Good projection will help and we would rather see a middle aged picture well projected than a first run murdered by an incompetent operator, but we cannot believe that an all junk service can be made good enough to please people who know of better things, and we'll be hanged if we know of an exchange that delivers a constantly good junk service.

Here's a paragraph from a personal friend. It was not written for publication but as Chapter XXXVI of a running story of his experiences.

> Our Mutual friend promised us three seven day films and two not over 60, four features a week to be in the first class. We get not less than one film from 95 to 120 days old with every bill. One day we had a feature 119 days old to carry three of the poorest dramas I ever saw.

That's a dated service and the best that has been given from three exchanges, though one Universal service did deliver some features the day ahead of the announced release. This is far from a $40 service and more money would be paid for better goods. Perhaps they do better by their patrons out west, but until the general standard of operating is raised we refuse to believe that a service thirty days and over can look as good as one of more recent date. Now and then a film will turn up that has seen little service and looks better than some seven day stuff that has been spending its time with boy operators, but it is the exception and not the rule, and it is not the age but the condition of the stuff that makes value or the reverse.

Next!

Hand Printing.

Charles W. Dorr, one of the proprietors of the Gem Theater, Winthrop, Mass., sends a couple of specimens of weekly programs printed on the mimeograph. He does not use the typewriter but the stylus and is an exceptionally clever letterer, the lettering being as uniform as print and giving much the effect that certain type faces aim at. He has a fancy front page with a sketch of a machine projecting the house title on the screen and with the mimeograph he turns out a neater job than many printers would give him. We have received work not so good from some of the "art printers" who pride themselves on novelties. A snappy paragraph is given each reel and the casts where these are available. The program is a real novelty and we thank Mr. Dorr for letting us see one.

Something New.

L. R. Ault, of the Casino Theater, Geneva, Ohio, writes:

> I am enclosing herewith a hand bill showing a feature that I am running this week at the Casino. In the smaller towns a manager is asked a great, great many questions and I finally came to the conclusion this would be a good stunt, and a drawing card it has proven to be. May I ask what you think of it? I think so well of it that I ask you kindly to give it space in the World for the benefit of other exhibitors. This is only the second day of the program and many people are already working on their Essays.

The "stunt" is a fifteen minute lecture nightly on some phase of the picture business, the topics being The Script, The Studio, the Camera, Production, and Projection. At the bottom a note reads:

> NOTICE—To show our appreciation of your attendance at these lectures, the Management will present, absolutely free, a premium (value $10) to the person writing the best Essay on Motion Pictures during the following week, i. e. week of July 14th.

We do not know how good the lecturer is, but the idea is distinctly good in arousing interest in the pictures. It would be better if the lecture could be given by one of the minor but well known players. It might pay some of them to think it over.

Wesley in Trouble.

Wesley, who says so, is in trouble. His stenographer got married and quit and he wrestles with the typewriter himself. Judging from the results it must be a fearful struggle when he starts to write a letter.

We are maliciously glad that he is up against it because he promised to come and see us when he hit this town and he didn't. He has closed down for "extensive repairs," but adds with pride that he held out longer than the opposition did. As a closing gasp he ran the Younger Brothers reel with one of the Youngers as an added attraction. We should think that he would close up after that. We hope that before the next season opens he makes a resolve not to use dime museum stuff.

Free Tickets.

Michael Orzeck, of the Majestic Theater, Marlin, Texas, sends in a set of five heralds and this explanatory letter:

> I put one of these out every week, the first four being good for one admission each day. This was a big drawing card as very few came alone, the holder of the free ticket bringing one or two others with him. This is a town of 4,000 and 800 heralds reached every white man's home. My house seats 600 and this scheme kept it full.
> I started the idea because a tent show came to town, which hurts our business every time. The first week I did not do any business, but the next week I issued the first of these coupon heralds and did a big business. At the end of the week the show left but I kept it up for four weeks as there are three shows here and in so small a town the competition is sharp. This week the herald does not carry a ticket, but the crowd seems eager to get them just the same to learn the coming attractions. The Wurlitzer Automatic Orchestra supplies the music in the afternoon and a six piece orchestra in the evenings. I claim to have one of the most up-to-date theaters in the South. Have a Powers 6 and Edison B and keep both in operation. I intend to run the herald regularly and to get some ads. to cover the cost. I would like some suggestions.

The first herald carried this coupon:

> DEMONSTRATION WEEK.
> We have thus named this week for the purpose of convincing the people as to the quality of our show, both as to the attractions we offer and the accommodations afforded by our Theater, which we think the very best.
> We will not go into details in this herald, but will ask you to accept the attached ticket, which is good for ONE ADMISSION, either adult or child, FREE.
> Present this Coupon at the Box Office, together with this Herald.
> Save the Herald.
> MAJESTIC THEATER
> This Coupon Good for
> ONE ADMISSION—ADULT OR CHILD
> During Week June 16 to 21 (Inclusive)
> DEMONSTRATION WEEK
> Good For One Performance Each Day
> Mon. Tues. Wed. Thurs. Fri. Sat.

Later each day's program had to be clipped out and presented at the door.

Some Suggestions.

The programs are rather unhandy as to shape and at the same time they will make it difficult to handle the advertising when it is obtained. A folder eleven inches long and only four wide looks out of proportion. More of a book form should be aimed at. A stamped envelope to Bert Williams at Ponca City, Oklahoma, should bring a booklet of convenient size that will give other suggestions. The advertisements should run top and bottom across page or up and down the page on the inside column, or else, and this is a better make up, the program pages should fall on the right hand or odd numbered pages with the advertising on the left with just enough reading on each page to make the advertising "on reading page" this reading matter being chat of the players and of the house. Later on we are going to pick up some of the Majestic items, for they are crisply worked and we think that Mr. Orzeck will have little trouble filling his sheet. He has them coming and by keeping interest to the house he will keep his patronage.

Another from Pittsburgh.

The Gem is the latest Pittsburgh program. In places it suggests the make up of the Cameraphone bulletins, but it is not a copy. The first page is given to the program for the week with detailed stories inside and a back page of advertisements. There is no general reading matter, but there is a good display of cuts of scenes and players. Mutual service is used. It is a very creditable issue, but it should carry some general matter to gain the best circulation and get into the homes.

Getting Ambitious.

The Fichtenberg enterprises, in New Orleans, announces in its Spotlight the institution of a Photoplaywright's column and an Inquiry column. They hardly have the space for the intelligent handling of the former, but it sounds well and they have a regular playwriter in charge. It also announces that it will bar correspondence school advertisements from its columns, which is decidedly a move in the right direction.

A Parade Display.

J. L. Frazier, of the Lowell Theater, Lowell, Arizona, sends this picture of his parade float in the Lowell Fourth of July Celebration. The paper flowers of which he speaks may be had from several Chicago companies which sell outfits of flowers and garlands for this express purpose. It might be a good scheme to tie passes to some of the flowers thrown to the crowd and advertise that fact in advance. Mr. Frazier writes:

Welcome
Mother & Sons '76
Pecial Patriotic Fea

> Enclosed you will find a photograph of our float which took first prize in the Fourth of July parade. The competition was strong as both Bisbee and Lowell were represented and there were some very fine floats in line. Bisbee is ten minutes from Lowell by street car and is really one big mining camp. Business is good with all, town while we are unincorporated. Business is good with all.
> This house seats 376, running straight pictures with the finest projection in the state. I found it an excellent advertisement for the theater as since the Fourth I have noticed new patrons coming that had never been in the house before.
> In addition to what you see in the photo I had twenty dozen select white carnations, each one carrying a silk ribbon with Lowell Theater printed in gold letters; these my wife tossed out to the crowds in the course of the parade. It is needless to say it made a great hit. The flowers on the buggy are made of paper, white chrysanthemums with yellow centers. Mrs. Frazier dressed in old gold messaline silk, hat of gold cloth with large ostrich tip. It made a beautiful showing and a splendid advertisement.

Looking Rathbone Over.

Every little while J. C. Rathbone, of the Opera House, Exeter, N. H., sends in a bundle of his advertising matter. There was nearly a pound in the last lot and there is plenty of good material in it.

"Vitalized history," for example, is a pretty good line for any historical subject. It puts the picture in a new light and it does not exaggerate.

Murder will out in the long run and one program gives the cast of a cantata by local talent and Mr. Rathbone shows that he is an actor as well as a manager by holding up one of the star parts. Actor-managers are rare in the picture end, but Mr. Rathbone qualifies because he builds up on the cantata by going in a minstrel show, sitting in the circle in the first part and playing in the afterpiece. Evidently he shares our belief that it pays to be a part of the town you're in.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

On the Way.

LAST week the forms of the new Technique of the Photoplay were sent to the presses and by the time this appears in print it is probable that the signatures will be in the bands of the binder. With a brief delay for international copyright purposes, the book should be ready for distribution August fifteenth.

There are 184 pages, of which 176 are given to the text matter proper, the rest being assigned to the table of contents, etc. One novel feature is the showing in typewriter type of all examples. This not only marks the example, but shows precisely how it should be written. The scripts of "From Ignorance to Light," and Lawrence S. McCloskey's "Auntie's Affinity," and "Friend John," are given in full and a fourth script is developed in the course of one of the chapters. An entire chapter is devoted to the study of the "punch"; there is a dictionary of technical terms and a series of questions and answers for ready reference that puts the most common problems in definite form, instead of stating the fect and leaving the reader to make his own deductions.

The regular edition will be bound in blue cloth and will sell for two dollars a copy. A limited edition will be bound flexibly in blue leather for desk use and will be sold for three dollars.

An entirely different treatment will make this book as useful to those who already have the first edition as to those who are newly starting. It will appeal to beginner and practiced writer alike. We think that the study of the punch, alone, will be worth the price of the book to the regular writer, most of whom are too prone to mistake sensation for the real punch.

Mrs. Breuil Retires.

We believe that any and every writer who at any time has had dealings with the Vitagraph Company will regret the passing of Mrs. Beta Breuil, their photoplay editor for several years. Mrs. Brueil has been something more than the person who has passed on manuscripts. She has been quick to help those who seemed to deserve help, and sometimes those who did not in the long run prove deserving. She has been accessible, courteous and helpful and she has done much to draw the better writers to the company she has represented. Although she retired several weeks ago, she made no mention of the fact and that she was no longer at the Flatbush studios was developed by chance.

In a recent letter, in which he reveiwed his past year of writing, and distributed his various credits, Marc Edmund Jones ascribes to Mrs. Breuil his first glimpse into the higher criticisms and we believe that Mr. Jones is by no means alone in this regard. She was willing to take the time from her busy day to help anyone who gave promise, and while she leaves behind a successor trained in her ways and methods, we think it will be some time before her place is taken. She has not yet sought a connection with another company and will not until a vacation has been enjoyed. She has worked constantly for the past three years without cessation and is entitled to a little "loafing time" before she again gets into the traces.

Mrs. Catherine Carr, author of "Her Sweetest Memory," "The Unwritten Chapter," "Father and Son," and other Vitagraph hits, who has been coached by Mrs. Breuil to the same modes of thought and action, remains in the staff and will gain equal regard with her late chief in the affections of the photoplaywrights—but we are going to miss Mrs. Breuil. Miss Birch succeeds as editor.

Trick Work.

Here is a letter evidently inspired by the announcement of the new edition of Technique of the Photoplay:

> "Technique of the Photoplay" is, I think, ably handled, complete in details of all articles treated, but lacking some very essential articles that would tend to annoy the beginner—namely, fading, double exposure and double print. Now I am thoroughly aware that you advise the novice to "lay away" from such; but if said novice possesses the faintest knowledge of picture production, he will be conservative in the use of double exposure, etc. Nevertheless, the time will arrive when he can be materially benefited by the knowledge of such photography and the manner in which to place it in the script. This is not intended as a criticism, but a fore-runner to the question—"Will the new book contain articles on or examples of the above mentioned?"

In the new version the matter is more fully treated than in the old as are all other phases of the work, for that, but the advice is still given to be moderate indeed in the use of mechanical tricks since all of these involve much more labor than the outsider can realize.

Take a fade, for example. This is an effect most generally used in film when part of the story is related as a dream or as a story within a story, each scene fading into the next. In this the scenes of the dream or tale must be taken in the order of their showing since the end of one scene is turned back and run down through again for the opening of the next scene. This involves so much labor and expense that at least one company has discarded the straight fade and now fades to blackness and from blackness back to the new scene instead of fading one scene into the next. This saves time and enables the scenes to be made at the convenience of the director, but it does not give the same artistic effect and it adds about ten feet to every scene because instead of coming up over the end of the last scene, the new scene starts to appear after the old scene has faded.

Double exposure and double printing; the last seldom if ever used now, are matters best left to the studio script writer. It is not likely that the outside script containing more than a scene or two in double will be bought and the chance of a sale is so slight that it will not pay the beginner to experiment. Just as a matter of fact the author should not indicate the means by which an effect is to be produced. That should be left to the director.

Still Talking Credit.

In a recent interview in a theatrical paper Capt. Leslie T. Peacocke says that the name of the author on the poster would make money for the exhibitor. Mebbe so, and then, again, mebbe not. He says that if the name of the author were to be placed on the poster the author of the better sort would be induced to write.

We must confess that we cannot see it. The real author, the man who writes because that is his trade, generally gets past the point where he likes to see his name in print and he is not to be coaxed with the promise that he'll go on the one sheets. We've had our name on three sheets and kept on wearing the same sized hat. The only place where our name looks good to us is on a check when Arthur Hotaling does not go fast asleep and forget to send in slips and when Fred Mace remembers to wind up the alarm clock. We do not care about getting on the three sheets, the one sheets or the eight sheets. We are contented if some few directors know we can deliver the goods to them. That, and not popular applause, is what brings the money to the author in the film business and that is what we rest content with.

There may come a time when the script will be produced precisely as the author wrote it, and the author will be entitled to full credit, but until that time does come, we think that all this discussion of the use of the author's name is foolish. It is like the payment at the "usual rate." Sometimes the author will get the best of it and sometimes the company will have the advantage, but the average remains the same.

Do good work, make your name with the editors and producers and you'll not have to worry about public praise or censure.

Kitchell on Ruts.

William H. Kitchell, speaking of contract writers, says: "The contract man writes in a mechanical way and gets in a groove. The director puts it on in a mechanical way and gets in another grove and two grooves make a rut."

That is true where the contract man does not take pains or where he is called upon to write beyond his capacity, but one of the best and most scholarly writers we know is Capt. Kiener, who for more than two years has been a contract writer for the Kalem company. He writes one a week and he writes of all phases of life, but he does not work beyond his capacity, or up to it, and he does not become rutted.

The contract writer who tries to do one a day and who does it because some director must make the story and he knows that the director must take it, is merely the figure of the moment because he cannot last any more than his company can.

There is a tendency to drop the contract man in favor of the first run writer who sells when he does something that is up to his mark. It broadens the field and lets down the bars for the beginners of promise.

But two grooves do make a rut and the photoplay writer does not have to be under contract to get into a rut, or half a one.

Here's the Answer.

In a sense, this discovery of a Pennsylvania photoplaywright seems to comprehend the whole. He was given opportunity to study a produced script and in returning it he writes:

> I see now where I made my mistake. To write a successful play you must have natural events happen in an unusual way, yet everything must be true to life.

That's just about where the matter stands. Your story must be unusual and yet it must seem real. Present the everyday happenings of life in an unusual aspect and yet these unusual factors must be produced so naturally that they seem real. The whole art of plot writing is merely that paragraph elaborated.

Multiple Reel Plots.

Here is a paragraph from a letter. We think it echoes the ideas of many others:

> While on this subject, I am sure I will be voicing the desire of a great many readers of your department in asking that you give us your opinion at length on the multiple reel subjects. Can a subject of more than three reels carry a good strong plot successfully through to the end? I have seen a good many which seemed to be only a series of incidents loosely knit together without any definite idea of a plot.

What you see and what can be done are sometimes two very different things. You see a lot of three-reel subjects that are no more than a lot of scenes strung together. That does not mean that it is not possible to write a three-reel story that will have three full reels of plot. It means that some self-contented director has loafed on his job again. He makes some big battle stuff, runs a big explosion or something like that and puffs himself with pride anew.

That doesn't mean that all three-reel plots are one sensation and 2,900 feet of nothing. How about "The Three Musketeers? Could not that be done in three, or four, or five reels full of action? That's a book, of course, but a book is merely a story in words instead of action, and if Dumas could write a book, someone else can write a play and put as much in the play.

Most assuredly a play, an original play, can be written to hold the interest every inch of three reels, or four, or five, if only the writer takes the same pains with the play as an author does with his book, and in a short time it will be required that the three-reel play must contain as much of a story in proportion to its length as the novelette or the novel.

It is not what is or what has been, but what must be that counts, and the day is not far distant when one big effect will not be regarded as a sufficient excuse for several hundred feet of padded action. At present the manufacturers turn to the standard and copyrighted fiction for their good multiple reels, but the time is close at hand when there will come a demand for original stuff, and if there are writers ready to supply the demand—and there will be—the fate of the complacent director who writes his own scripts will be sealed. The trouble with the many multiple reels at present is that the man who makes them is so puffed up with his own conceit that he cannot see merit in the work of another and so his imagination runs round in circles, like a dog chasing its tail, and we get the same old stuff over and over again. After he gets fired off his job, the man who really can write will get a chance along with the man who is intelligent enough to be able to realize the work of another.

If we thought that the photoplay writing business would never be better than it is today, we would not waste so much time over it, but the man who is writing one-reel stories today is going to be the three-part writer of tomorrow and it is worth while helping him along.

Most assuredly there can and will be three and four and five part stories with plenty of plot, plenty of action and plenty of interest to every foot. There are a few right now. There would be more if the manufacturers of film did not place their directors on a pedestal and bow down and worship. There are plenty of good directors, but the braggart makes the biggest noise and still has the best position, though even now his throne is tottering and about to fall.

Some Suggestions and Others.

A Brooklyn correspondent writes in complaint and suggestion as follows:

> One thing that "peeves" me is the checked rejection slip—not the slip itself, but the use of it. The slips referred to are those which carry a list of reasons for rejection, one of which is checked off. Now, in nearly every case, the reason checked off is, "Unavailable for present use." Surely this, although true, does not apply strictly in every case. Often the real reason might be, "Similar theme done before," "Not our style," "Plot lacks strength," etc. I appreciate the fact that the editor is a busy man; but I fail to see why it takes any less time to check off the generally applicable reason, rather than the strictly applicable one. If rightly checked off, this kind of rejection slip is hailed by me with almost as much pleasure as a check. Being always willing to receive an editor's judgment, if he says my story is too conventional. or its plot lacks strength, I bolster it up accordingly. For one is not the best judge of one's work; criticism teaches more in a minute than can be learned in an hour otherwise.
> I have a method of my own as regards photoplay work, which I have not seen mentioned in your columns, and so pass along. When I first began to write for the motion pictures, I found the technique, of course, the hardest part. How to "get things over" puzzled me. So in addition to my "Idea Book," I started a "get over" book, which I still continue. Whenever I saw an idea, hard to handle, well gotten over on the screen without the aid of leader, or with very little leader, I noted it down. Thus, when I am stuck in the middle of a story, I am apt to find a description in my book of how Edison or Vitagraph got a similar idea over.
> I do not depend on photoplay work alone for my meal tickets, and therefore find it all the more fascinating. I would like here to acknowledge what an aid your department has been to me. Through a "tip" in it I sold my first story (to Kinemacolor) last October, a sale which greatly encouraged me. I have sold quite a few since then to various companies (Edison and Selig among them) but I still recall my pride in that Kinemacolor check.
> One thing has sort of made me smile. You, and other good authorities, advise the beginner to stick to drama, comedy being too hard. All my stories that have sold have been comedies, with the exception of one comedy drama. I have yet to sell a drama.

Our correspondent overlooks the fact that the real functions of an editor are to select scripts and get them into shape for production. It is no part of his employment to teach the art of photoplay, and for that matter it is rather a thankless task at best, as so many who receive the checked slip argue the question in one or more letters. The man who has played the game longer does not want the checked slip. He is content with the "not available" or even a script accompanied by no explanation whatever. The important point to him is that this particular company does not want the script in question.

A get-around-it book is useful, but it is better to get some other way of bridging a difficulty, giving your script a novelty that will help the sale.

And lastly, the correspondent should realize that if he can write comedies, he is the exception and not the rule, and should rejoice that he can write comedies. Few authors can at the start and some never catch the knack.

Try This.

Build a little gymnasium for your imagination and give it plenty of exercise. The real secret of success is an ability to originate plots and then give them proper development in the script. First you must have the plot, so study plots. Get your imagination busy with plots, and more plots and still other plots, but always plots.

You get on the street car to go to the office. Across the way is a man with one arm. How did he lose his arm? Don't ask him. Build plots about lost arms all the way down to the office.

At the office a beggar comes in. Work out a plot about the beggar. The stenographer breaks her typewriter. A repair man is sent for. He repairs the machine. Nothing startling in that? Possibly not. But suppose that the night before he has quarreled with the typewriter. He wants to ask to be forgiven, but does not know how. She pretends she doesn't know him when he comes into the office. On the machine he writes his apology instead of one of the usual test sentences. He asks her if the machine is all right. She reads his note and, pretending to try the machine for herself, writes a message of forgiveness. He suddenly seizes her in his arms and kisses her. The boss nearly faints and the bookkeeper calls a policeman and comes in to get the explanation to pass along to the officer. No plot there?

There is a plot in everything from a piece of blank paper to the cave-in of the Woolworth building. The plot is there. The only thing needed is the trained imagination that can see the plot and this can be developed by looking for a plot in everything. Build a little gymnasium for your imagination and give it plenty of exercise.

Has a Side Line.

One of the schools now has a side line in a book that "teaches" photoplay acting. The idea is that if you learn how to act you can make your plays more practical. The argument is attractive but fallacious. No knowledge of acting is required to write a play and a knowledge of acting will not help. On the other hand, it may hinder your development of the plot, because you perpetually wonder if this or that is practicable. The only knowledge of acting that can possibly help comes only from standing beside the director day after day. A book will hurt, not help, just as the person who studies the technique of form to the conclusion of the technique of construction, replaces soul with theory.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE.

W. B. H.—The form of letter advising a company that you withdraw your script has been printed several times. It is also given in the new "Technique of the Photoplay." Simply say in effect that you withdraw the script, and that you will submit it elsewhere, and shall hold them responsible if they make use of the script. Register the letter. Several of the lost scripts that turned up were lost again. We have no knowledge of the company or the editor at present. The company never released any films.

W. K.—The Vitagraph Company still have their goats, but they are not working the elephants at present.

B. M.—Guy Coombs was Kerchival West in "Shenandoah." He has been with Kalem for some time. Previous to that he was with Edison. King Baggot has not returned from England, but reports would indicate that he is not exactly "still" there.

RUBENA—The merciful fates be praised that you have found a new rave, but Walter Miller has been playing in Biograph pictures for some time. You're late with your discoveries. Fire scenes are mostly produced with smoke pots or smudges, but frequently the draperies are really set afire to give realism. A hose does the rest after the picture is made. There is no danger of a general conflagration.

W. M.—You do not stand much chance of getting a job as an actor. We've a lot here in New York and many in Los Angeles; more than are needed. Give up the idea.

LOIS—The boat house is at the left of the picture, yes? It is one of the most perfect reflections we have ever seen. Thanks.

W. M. Y.—Your story is returned as "having been done before" because you are being paid for original work. If some studio writer frankly uses old material, that's a different matter. They want the outside contribution, but if they cannot get the original ideas they will work over the second hand material themselves. No use paying you for a second hand idea when they can make it at less cost themselves, but they are willing to pay you for new thoughts, not only willing, but glad. See the difference?

NORMA—Wallace Reid is cast in "The Kiss." We have not the other cast recorded. We do not place that Broncho player. Foreign casts are not supplied to the American agents as a rule. Sorry we can do no better.

J. H. F.—The Kay-Bee Identifier says that it was Charles Dudley, and not Robert Chandler, who played Col. West in "An Indian Nemesis," and that Miss Sybil Bowman was the Indian girl in love with Lawson. Miss Mabel Normand slapped Charles Avery's face in "The Tell Tale Light," and Miss Alice Davenport put Tom through the third degree. Other replies later.

VARIOUS INQUIRERS—The Biograph Identifier contributes these belated replies: Miss Mildred Manning was the wife of Raffles in "A Chance Deception." Mr. Carroll played the title role in "The Masher Cop," the blase woman in "The Mothering Heart" was Miss Pierce, and Miss Viola Barry was the stenographer in "A Frightful Blunder."

A. M. L.—We cannot supply foreign casts. It was a real snake used. The other casts have not been supplied us. Sorry.

A. J. D.—Nestor's Fatty is Howard Davis. Miss Mona Darkfeather and Art Ortega had the leads in "The Spring in the Desert." The Imp and Rex casts are not on record and may not be obtained.

RUBENA—Don't get Slivers. Miss Barbara Tennant was Alice in "The Return of Crime." Hope you get the prize.

E. L.—Keystone advertises that it wants the synopsis only, but that the synopsis must have a really and truly, honest-to-goodness idea. We never heard that Mr. Anderson was in the army. You'll hear a lot of things that are closely akin to lies, if you listen to all the gossip of the fans. The paper is of proper size and weight, very good paper, indeed, in fact.

Operators' Union Directory, I. A. T. S. E.

NOTICE. Each union is entitled to have its roster of officers meeting nights, etc., here once per year free of cost. Preserve this list as it will not be re-published. The mail address of the secretary should be included in each list, as well as the address of regular meeting place, if any.

Moving Picture and Projection Machine Operators' Union No. 171, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Ralph C. Freeman, President; John Richardson, 406 Smithfield Street, Cor. & Rec. Secretary; Fred Fulgara, Financial Secretary. Meetings first and third Sundays at 406 Smithfield Street.

From Chicago.

Mr. W. A. Rosenblum, Chicago, Ill., writes:

> I served a year's apprenticeship and passed the city examination, and am now on my first job, but I have struck a snag, on which I hope you will be able to give me assistance. I get a flash of fire when I strike the arc, or right soon thereafter, which burns and discolors my condensers so badly that I have to wipe them off before I can get a decent light. The flash or rush of flame is so strong that it often cracks the condenser and burns right into it. generally occurs when I strike the arc after changing carbons after running two or three hours, or longer, like on holidays or Sundays. I never experience this trouble during a first show. It will run along all right for three or four days, or perhaps a week, and then, bang! she goes. I pull 60 amperes through a Fort Wayne compensarc. My contacts are all clean and tight, and I recently put in new No. 6 wires from the compensarc to the lamp. I have used three kinds of carbons, but it acts the same on all. I do not know where the thing would stop if I did not pull the switch.

Well, friend Rosenblum, I guess you have sprung a new one. If the thing is as you describe it, the only answer I can see is that for some reason or other you occasionally get a very heavy momentary increase in voltage. But if that is true your incadescent lamps ought to flare up also. The condition, as described, is decidedly peculiar, and altogether out of the ordinary. If any reader of the department has had a similar experience, or feels he can offer any advice of value on the subject let him stand forth and be heard. This is one of those cases that are sometimes impossible to diagnose and remedy at long distance. If I were right on the spot I might get to the bottom of the trouble without delay. In a city like Chicago, where there are such concerns as the Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., and the Kleine Optical Co., it would be better to call in one of their men rather than let the trouble continue.

A Foolish Policy.

Georgia writes, asking, for very obvious reasons, that his name and the name of the town be omitted:

> For the first time I apply to the Department for an opinion. We formed a local of the I. A. T. S. E., here recently. After I had signed the application for the charter my boss came up and told me I would either have to give up my job or have my name taken off the application blank. I told him to get another operator as soon as he could, for I intended to stick to the Union, although I did lose my job. I would like to know your opinion on the matter. Do you think I did the right thing?

I think that that manager did a very foolish thing. Supposing, he had joined the Exhibitors' League, and you had gone to him and said: "unless you take your name off the application for the exhibitors league membership I will quit." He would have put you down as a very foolish man, would he not? He would very probably have asked you what business it was of yours what he joined, or what he did not join. Well, it is just as much your business what he joins as it is his business what you join. It is really too bad that managers will take such an unreasonable stand as this, and try to dictate what a man shall and shall not belong to. In my opinion you did the only thing a man could do and retain your self respect.

Announcement Slide Scheme.

> I have been operating a moving picture machine for the past five years for myself, that is, having an interest in the theater. I worked until just recently and now, having sold out, will take a vacation. Projection here is good, two shows using Power's Six machines and G. E. Rectifier. The projection department has been by only instructor, and I owe a whole lot to it. I have a new announcement slide scheme which I will submit. Have your local printer set up whatever you want on the slide. Then have him ink the type and run a good, smooth, clean, rubber roller over the type. It will take an imprint of the type and when the roller is run over a slide cover glass the impression will be transformed to the glass, now bind up the slide, with a piece of colored gelatine inside, and you will have a very neat article. Stiff ink should be used. My local printer charges 25 cents per slide. Of course, I furnish the glass and bind them up.

Your scheme is excellent Brother Berta, but you would get very much better results by taking an impression on the gelatine directly from the type, an easy thing to do after the printer gets the hang of it, if you could have the type locked up in a press and the gelatine printed on in the regular way. The effect would be perfect, but that makes a lot of work. For permanent announcement slides, however, the result is not to be equalled, except by photography, the only difficulty being that such slides cannot be left in the heat of the arc very long or the gelatine will melt.

Day and Night Screen.

Mr. L. A. Thompson, known to fame as the inventor of the Scenic Railway, has entered the projection field by way of the screen door. Mr. Thompson has bought the American rights to a screen which has, according to all reports, produced most excellent results in Europe. It comes highly recommended by the Gaumont people, who are using it for the American demonstration of their color pictures. Mr. A. M. Baber, whom Mr. Thomposon has placed in charge of the proposition as manager, invited the editor out to Newark some weeks ago to witness a demonstration, but, due, apparently, to the fact that the screen was not properly installed, the demonstration was not altogether satisfactory; also the screen at Newark was for daylight projection only. I saw enough, however, to arouse my interest, and I told Mr. Baber that as soon as he secured a new screen and it was installed, I would be glad to view its performance. I also called on Mr. Thompson and informed him that Mr. Baber must be placed in position to make a proper demonstration of the screen, unless he wanted to give the whole proposition a black eye right at the beginning. Something like a month afterwards, Mr. Baber informed me that Mr. Thompson had secured a new screen, of the type designed for both daylight and night projection, and that it was installed in Steeple Chase Park, Rockaway Beach. I journeyed to Rockaway and, as there was no show that day the operator was absent; but I found the house electrician making strenuous efforts to get a light with the projection lamp, without results. Before a light was secured it was necessary to take the inductor apart, tighten its contacts, repair its switches, and to mighty near rebuild the lamp as well. It was in a horrible condition. How on earth a man can call himself an operator, or even a good imitation of one, and allow his appliances to get into such a disgraceful condition is utterly beyond my comprehension. The lamp evidently had never known a touch of graphite. It was dry as the proverbial bone, loose in its base and about every where else it could be loose, except the up and down adjustment, which was so tight that the lamp could not be moved that way at all. Besides this all the carbon clamps were very dirty, the lugs were in bad condition and one of the wires almost burned off inside the lug, yet, somehow or other that "operator" had been putting on a show, though I think it must have been in the nature of a "holy show." Well, after almost two and a half hours work we got the lamp and inductor into shape and projected a reel of film. It was dark by that time, so I had no opportunity of viewing the performance of the screen by daylight. With a Power's inductor at its lowest notch, the 16½ foot picture was very good indeed. The whites showed up pure white, and the detail was remarkable. I do not think there is any question as to the value of this screen. Mr. Baber informs me that its surface will be absolutely warranted against any change of any kind for five years. There is no more out of focus effect, either when close to the screen or at an angle, than there is with the ordinary cloth screen. The screen was shown and demonstrated at the New York exposition.

For purely daylight projection a special type of screen is used, and the audience must sit approximately in front of the screen, but one peculiarity is that the further you get away from the screen, within reason, the brighter the picture looks. In this particular it resembles the mirror screen. With the daylight screen the moment you get a little to one side or view the projection at an angle the picture fades away and can scarcely be seen. This particular type of screen, however, is only designed to be used in out-door daylight projection, or for projection in a very light hall. The type of screen viewed in Rockaway is designed for use inside of an ordinary theater either by day or night, and while I cannot as yet vouch for the daylight end of it, the effect at night was altogether good.

Electric Light Plants.

With all due respect to the various companies putting out theater electric light outfits, or, rather, outfits for generating electric current, and freely admitting that some of these machines are good, and, in the hands of the right man, produce excellent results, still, I believe there is a lot of room for improvement along these lines, and that there is plenty of room for companies to do a little more specializing on theater light plants. In glancing over foreign publications I find a number of outfits which, it seems to me, would be calculated to produce far better results in the hands of experienced men than our own home-made product would produce.

A great many of these foreign outfits have an engine either identical with or very similar to the automobile engine, and it seems to me that this is proceeding along the right lines. The modern automobile engine is not only thoroughly reliable and dependable, but it is as near fool proof as it is possible to make such a machine, and the power, even of the smaller makes, is ample. I have before me the cut of a theater electric light outfit made in London. It consists of a substantial looking generator and an engine having four cylinders, rated at 70 brake horse power—an automobile engine, or at least that is what it looks like. The price is not given but, assuming it to be a good engine, I will bet dollars to hard boiled eggs that that outfit will deliver the goods and give satisfaction, even in the hands of a novice. It is, of course, true that such an outfit would cost considerably more money than those now sold in this country; or at least I suppose it would. But, even so, it is worth the price. So far as I know, there is not an outfit of this kind in America, though we have available any number of excellent engines of the automobile or gasoline launch type, and, generators of every kind and description.

Suppose it does cost more money. The moving picture exhibiting business is now a known quantity. Theaters by the hundreds are being erected, at a cost of many thousands of dollars each, and if a generating outfit is installed it will pay for itself, even though it cost $1,000.00, in the course of time. But, in order to give the desired result it must be a high-class, thoroughly reliable outfit, and in order to obtain such an outfit what difference does $200.00 or $300.00, or for that matter even $500.00, make after all? Of course, in the small store room show the manager does not like to lay out a large sum of money if he can get something cheaper, but he should always remember the fact that the cheap thing is not always the cheapest in the end.

Now, please thoroughly understand that I am in no sense "knocking" the present outfits. What I am trying to do is to call the attention of their manufacturers to the fact that it would be well for them to put out a higher priced, higher type of outfit, with a generator directly connected to an engine of the launch or automobile type.

An Enthusiastic Brother.

Brother B. E. Icanberry, secretary I. A. T. S. E. local union 169, Oakland, California, encloses check for $3.00 for a year's subscription to the Moving Picture World for local 169, and says:

> We note in the June 14th issue, where you gave the Toronto, Ontario, union a boost, and the U. S. unions a little rebuke. Now we were pleased to see the boost for Toronto, but you must take into consideration the fact that some unions, both in the U. S. and Canada, have only one meeting a month, and have not had the opportunity of officially availing themselves of your offer in the May 3rd issue. The committee of our local held the first school session last week. It was well attended by the brother members who are enthusiastic over the lessons and the work before them. The committee is fully prepared to handle your questions. We find your hand book of untold value, because it is so clear and concise.

While Oakland's "once a month" excuse is accepted, because they acted on the matter and informed me of the fact some time ago, that excuse does not hold good any longer. There are a great many unions, particularly in the large cities, who can take no credit to themselves for having failed to promptly co-operate in this matter.

And now let me say to our readers that the first questions will be for the most part concerning dynamos and electrical matters, and will doubtless prove to be somewhat dry and uninteresting; but they are, nevertheless, of much importance because more and more theaters are putting in motor-generator sets, and operators are called upon to handle them, therefore the operator should have some knowledge of the fundamental principles involved in current generation. I have no doubt but that any enterprising operator, who really gets down and grubs, can dig up the answers to these questions. The power house electrician or engineer will no doubt be glad to help you and your public library offers facilities which should not be overlooked. As we progress, however, the questions will become more intimately connected with your every day work, and will therefore be of more absorbing interest. But, after all, the thing that is going to be of greatest value will be the discussion on the various points which will naturally occur if the individual answers be posted, as suggested, creating much interest and tending to fix the answers in one's mind for good and all. I want to say right now that the answers I shall give will be correct, because I shall, after formulating them, have them reviewed by some of the best electricians and authorities in the country, therefore, if the answer does not agree with your ideas, do not swell up and say I am wrong, because I am going to take particular pains not to be wrong—you can gamble your suspender buttons on that. This must be qualified, however, since some questions, such as those involving care of commutators, for instance, are open to debate as to what really is best. In such things as this I can only set forth what, all things considered, seems to be best.

Regulations Criticized.

Mr. John A. Mills, of Shriner, Texas, writes:

> I notice, in June 21st issue, the British Columbia regulations for operating moving picture machines. I think you named it right (a big joke). I am glad indeed that I am not a victim of that set of laws—in other words an operator in that section of the country. In section 21 see the dimensions of the door set forth. Did those wonderful law makers expect exhibitors were going to use a cigar box with the bottom knocked out for an operating room? Section 9 states that rheostats must be located outside the operating room, in which case the operator would have to stop his machine and go outside the room to adjust his rheostat, if there be trouble with the current, but best of all the operator is not allowed to have even a book of instructions inside the operating room. I wonder if they will search him every time he goes to work to see if he has one concealed in his pocket. If it wasn't for being greedy I would like to see the whole Moving Picture World devoted to the Projection Department. Before closing let me say that I would like to be the "good husky operator" you speak of, in commenting on the B. C. Canada, for I know that the Irish that is in me could and would do the nose rubbing all right.

All this requires little comment except where Brother Mills says: "he would have to go outside the operating room." By this he probably means that if he were using an adjustable rheostat and wanted to change the current flow in case of a drop or change in voltage, or a change from very light to very dense film or vice versa, he could not do it with his rheostat located outside the room.

Motor-Generator Sets.

Mr. J. H. Hallberg, New York City, sets forth certain things concerning motor-generator set. I can back Mr. Hallberg up to the extent of saying that his a. c. to d. c. economizer (in effect a motor-generator set, with a generator of peculiar type which delivers current to the arc at arc voltage, without any resistance in series therewith), is a practical machine which has given excellent results. I have had no bad reports concerning the same, and, on the other hand, have had a considerable number of good ones. Mr. Hallberg writes as follows:

> I am much interested in the letter from Mr. Potter, Vancouver, B. C., page 1356, June 23rd issue, concerning the Mercury Arc Rectifiers, rotary converters and motor-generator sets used in Vancouver, B. C. This communication sets forth the fact that there are about 20 M. P. theaters in Vancouver, about 95% of which use motor-generator sets, there being no d. c. service. The specification for the motor-generator sets are particularly interesting in that the d. c. dynamo output is given as 40 amperes, requiring an 8 h. p. motor to drive, about the smallest size motor which can be used for such a generator. Of this 8 h. p. intake, with an arc requiring at a maximum 60 volts at 40 amperes, which would be the maximum output of the generator there is only about 3¼ h. p. used for light production showing a waste or loss in transformation from a. c. to d. c. of 4¾ h. p. which gives an efficiency around 40%.
> I have for years offered for sale my a. c. to d. c. economizer which has a much higher operating efficiency than the motor-generator set mentioned by Mr. Potter. In fact, I may say that I will guarantee to produce as good, or better a light than that produced by the motor-generator sets used in Vancouver, with less than 5 h. p. intake from the line. As a matter of fact, my a. c. to d. c. is adjustable to deliver up to 60 amperes continuously with about 5 h. p. taken from the line. If we should reduce these figures to actual killowatt consumption the guaranteed saving of my a. c. to d. c. economizer, as against the motor-generator set used in Vancouver, would be 2¼ k. w. per hour, or on six hours operation per day there would be a saving of 13½ k. w. per day, or 4,050 k. w. per year of 300 days. Should the Vancouver current be ten cents per k. w. this would amount to $405.00 per year for operating six hours per day, 300 days per year, which would just about pay for the delivery including the duty in Canada of one of my 60 ampere economizer sets. Of course, if the current costs only 5 cents per k. w. then the saving would be only about $200.00, or if there be ten of these generator sets in operation in Vancouver, figuring on the above basis, Vancouver exhibitors would save $4,000.00 per annum and could well afford to discard the motor generator sets they now have, which give only 40 amperes at the arc and save enough money to pay for the new machine at the end of the year, selling the present ones for whatever they can get, and the selling price would represent the additional profit for the first year. After that the saving would be about $400.00 per year for each theater, provided they pay ten cents for current and operate six hours per day. However, in this connection, you should not lose sight of the fact that my equipment would give 25 to 30% more light, because it is normally made to operate at 60 amperes and, at a pinch, can be adjusted up to 70 amperes for short periods of time. I am led to give the above comparative figures because they are so remarkable that it is difficult to understand why exhibitors will invest in low efficiency machines, when those of high efficiency are available. I am sure that your readers will be interested in learning the above facts and, after all, efficiency in operation is what saves money and gives the results.

In addition to the comment already made I will say that the efficiency Mr. Hallberg claims is largely due to the fact that no resistance is required in series with the arc, therefore, omitting the unavoidable waste in every motor and generator there is no waste at all. Whereas the type of generator used in Vancouver is, presumably, one requiring resistance in series with the arc. If this is a fact then the Vancouver motor-generators not only have the loss inherent in every motor and every generator, which may be large or small according to the type of machine which in any event would hardly be less than 33⅓ percent, but they will also have the additional loss caused by the resistance necessary in series with the arc. So far as neighbor Hallberg's comparative figures are concerned, they are his figures and it is up to him to back them up. I could not vouch for their correctness. The Department extends to other manufacturers of motor-generator outfits the same privilege accorded Mr. Hallberg, with the stipulation, however, that claims which are extravagant on their face, and which we have reason to believe are not true, will not be allowed. I have allowed Mr. Hallberg some latitude in this direction, because I personally know that his outfit is delivering the goods in a number of cases, and, while his claim as to efficiency may (or may not), be somewhat more rosy than the facts warrant, still I think there is at least good foundation, in fact, for his figures.

Power's Mechanical Speed Controller for Motor-Drive.

The Nicholas Power Company has placed on the market an excellent device for speed regulation of motor-driven machines, the same being available for either Six or Six-A machines. The peculiar advantage of this device lies in the fact that: (a) the motor itself runs at constant speed, regardless of the crank speed of the mechanism or, in fact, whether or not the machine is running at all. The speed controlling lever 903, plate 1, has nineteen notches, thus giving a possible variation of nineteen different speeds. The change from one speed to the next is made merely by moving lever 903, plate 1. Plate 1 shows the device from the right hand, or operating side; while plate 2 shows it from the opposite, or left hand side. In plate 1, 917 is the motor, which may be either a. c., or d. c. 911 shows a flat friction wheel or disc, the center of which is turned out or indented. Friction wheel 922, plate 1, is carried in a frame, and is on the same spindle with belt pulley 909, plate 2; so that belt wheel 909 makes one revolution every time friction wheel 922 revolves. Arrow 923, plate 1, indicates the central leather filling of friction wheel 922, and it is the edge of this leather bearing upon friction disc 911, plate 1, which causes friction wheel 922 and belt pulley 909 to revolve. Of course, friction wheel 922 must bear against friction wheel 911 with considerable pressure, and this pressure is supplied by spring 916, plate 1, and a similar spring on the opposite side, shown in plate 2. Now it will readily be seen that when friction wheel 922 is in central position, it is over the indent in friction disc 911; therefore, although the latter be running at full speed, no friction is applied, and belt pulley 909, plate 2, is not revolved, therefore the mechanism stands still. But, if lever 903 be moved, carrying friction wheel 922 to the right, it passes out of the indent in friction wheel 911 and engages the surface of the wheel and, of course, the further it is moved to the right by lever 903, the greater will be its speed, and therefore the greater the speed of mechanism. Briefly, that is the operation of the device.

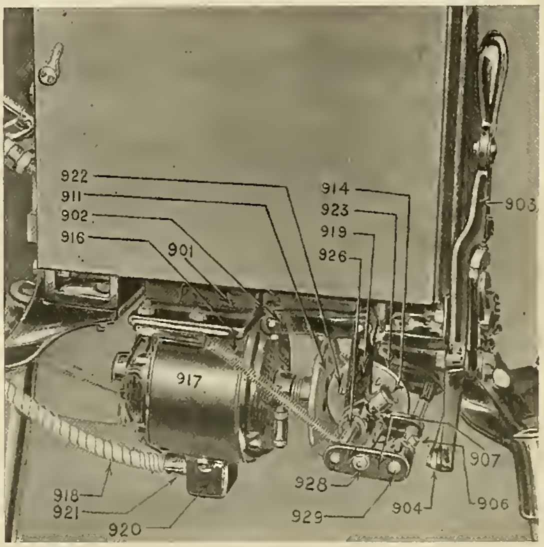

Plate 1.

In the later Power's Six-A machines, the frame casting contains holes, so that the motor and speed controller may be ordered and attached by the operator himself. In order to do this, casting 901 is first attached to the frame by four quarter inch machine screws. The motor itself is then attached to casting 901 by bolts as shown, and the lever and quadrant is fastened to the machine frame by removing the two bolts which hold the upper half of the front-leg casting to the main frame, and clamping the quadrant arm under them.

The limit of speed may be changed by moving collar 906, plate 1, ahead or back on its shaft. The numbers used on plates 1 and 2 are the stock numbers employed by the Nicholas Power Company, and they may be used in ordering parts.

Should the armature of the motor burn out, or should it become necessary, for any other reason, to remove the same, it can be done as follows: Release spring 916, plate 1, and its mate on the opposite side, after which take the motor loose from its foundation. Loosen the two set screws in the hub of motor disc-wheel, 911, plate 1, backing them out considerably as they are countersunk into the shaft, and pull the disc wheel from the shaft, tapping lightly if necessary, to start it. Next remove the three screws holding the cast iron covering on the right hand end of the motor—the end next the disc wheel. Next loosen the screw behind the lower end of the left hand oil cup, and open the two little cast iron doors in the housing, and, lifting the springs off the brushes, remove them. You may now pull the armature out, being very careful not to strike it against anything so as to injure the insulation. Always stand an armature up on its end. Never lay it down flat, except on a soft pad. Should the right hand bearing of the motor become worn, remove the motor disc-wheel, as before directed, and the end covering of the motor which carries the bearing. Next screw out the oil cup in the hub of the casing and loosen the two set screws in the casing hub, after which the bearing may be driven out, using a hard wood or a soft metal punch, and a new one inserted. Should it be necessary to renew the left hand bearing, first remove the armature, as before directed, and then, having loosened the set screws in the hub of the left hand casing and taken out the oil cup, drive out the bearing by using a long hard wood punch. It is possible to take the armature out at the left hand end of the motor, but it is not advisable, since this disturbs the brushes and brush holders, all of which must be removed.

The friction disc, which is composed of side 922, plate 1, center friction leather 923, plate 1, and side 910, plate 2, may be removed as follows: Loosen the set screw in the top of casting 907, plate 1, and pull the casting off. Next loosen the set screw holding casting 908, plate 2, and pull the casting off. Loosen the set screw in the hub of belt wheel 909, plate 2, and in the hub of the friction disc wheel. Shaft 926, plates 1 and 2, may then be pulled out, which will release the friction disc-wheel. A new friction leather may then, if desired, be substituted for the old one, by taking the wheel apart, after which the same may be trued up by putting back into place and starting the motor running, setting the disc wheel clear out so that it will run on top speed. Get a narrow thin board about a foot long, and on its surface tack some of No. 2 sand paper. Place one end of the board against one of the castings of the machine, so as to secure a leverage and hold the sandpaper against the wheel until the disc is ground down true.

The motor brushes may be renewed by loosening the screw behind the end of the left hand oil-cup, which releases the two doors in the cast iron casing, or housing. Lift the spring holding the brush in place, pull the old brush out and put in a new one. There is no adjustment to the brushes. Should one of the springs become weak, do not try to adjust it. Get a new one. Should the motor commutator become roughened or blackened so that it sparks, set the motor running, with friction disc-wheel in center position so that the motor has no load, and hold No. 00 sandpaper lightly against the commutator until it is polished, after which lightly moisten a clean cloth with thin oil (being careful not to get too much oil) and apply to the commutator for a few seconds. Let me caution you, however, to use the thin oil and not too much of it. In using sandpaper on the commutator it is recommended that the sandpaper be first moistened with thin oil.

"ZEB. ZACK AND THE ZULUS" (Lubin), July 24.—The marvelously picturesque quality of the scenes and all that can be included under staging give this offering high merit. It is played wholly by darkies. That picture of the impi of Zulus running over the hill in chase of the two darkey missionaries who have seen the big cooking pots and the black cannibal chef would make a great drawing, and many of the other scenes are as good, pictorially. The story is good, too, but using the rag-time dance to get the chief and all the rest of the Zulus "doing it," so that the missionaries could finally escape seems not so good to us as other clever situations in the story, the one made by the big plug of chewing tobacco, for instance. The script, by E. W. Sargent, was produced by Arthur Hotaling. The audience liked the offering, which is very finely photographed.

"THE BROWNS STUDY ASTROLOGY" (Essanay), July 24.—There is no great amount of true entertainment in this offering; it is too slow and too full of repetition. One can hardly take the situation, as shown, seriously enough to see the fun in it.

"BUILDING THE CHATTANOOGA DAM" (Essanay), July 24.—On the same reel is this picture of big work going on. It is an offering that will excite comment and enthusiasm; in fact, there is a good thrill in it. The photography is clear.

"TWO ARTISTS AND ONE SUIT OF CLOTHES" (Selig), July 24.—There is not much "stalling" in this farce comedy, but the action seems a bit unnatural and stagey, which hampers the funmaking of its situations. It brought out no laughter in the audience with whom we saw it. There is also little that is really new, except in the arrangement of its plot. The script is by Malcolm Douglas and was produced by Charles France. Palmer Bowman and Maxwell Sargent play the two artists. Harriet Notter plays the sweetheart of the first artist, with Lillian Leighton as her mother. John Lancaster plays a Jewish pawnbroker. The photography is fair.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 35," July 24.—A good number; it hardly needs description, for it is always popular and is even better this week than usual.

"OPPORTUNITY AND A MILLION ACRES" (Patheplay), July 24.—Harney County, Oregon, seems, from the picture, to have been a desert into which a great volume of water has been turned. The picture is clearly enough photographed and its subject is very well worth seeing. Some big herds of cattle and some fine looking pigs are exhibited.

"THE ISLAND OF TONGA" (Patheplay), July 24.—The photography of this interesting island in the Southern Pacific is clear enough to let us see pretty well what it is like; but the subjects were not chosen with a view of making us intimately acquainted with the place. Dock scenes are always shown and so, it seems, is the inevitable race in the island canoes.

"COFFEE INDUSTRY OF JAMAICA" (Lubin), July 24.—A very instructive offering that should be welcome to all, on account of its subject. It is thorough in its picturing of the plant, the picking, the treatment, etc., of coffee. The photography is commendable.

"THE MIRROR" (Biograph), July 24.—A perfectly planned melodrama that is hardly very new, yet that decidedly "got hold" of several in the audience—it made 'em holler. One will find in it the Biograph earnestness; there is, for instance, a good stiff scrap at the end that seems quite like the real thing. It uses the situation of the girl alone in the house trying to save some money from a gang of tramps. Her lover is the telegraph operator at the little railroad station, and she flashes a message across the fields in the Morse code to him with a mirror. He brings railroaders to the rescue and we have the scrap. It is told very clearly and smoothly so that it "gets over" and makes the audience sit up to follow it, in many cases breathlessly. Claire McDowell plays the girl; Henry Walthall, the operator; Lionel Barrymore, the girl's father, and Harry Cary, the first tramp. The photography is serviceable.

"AN OLD MAN'S LOVE STORY" (Vitagraph), July 24.—There have been greater pictures with more significant stories, but we doubt whether there have been many better or more pleasing in this showing of natural, human things. The story is by W. A. Tremayne and has been skillfully planned to go upon the screen. The picture's real quality comes from the way the script has been handled by producer, stage manager and artists. The unconstrained naturalness of its characters is its best charm, but not its only high quality by any means; for camera man and nearly everyone else concerned have worked together to an end that is truly worth while. The second best quality that we notice is the economy of its action, the things that it didn't show delight us greatly; we are bothered with nothing our eyes would picture for ourselves and miss no link that our imagination needs.

Florence Radinoff and James Lackeye play the parents of a daughter, Norma Talmadge, whom they want to marry a rich old man, Van Dyke Brooke. To show how vividly the players have imagined the situation, we pick out one of many good incidents. The father is about to offer the rich, prospective son-in-law, Van Dyke Brooke, a cigar, and we can tell by the way he handles them that he has provided himself with real good ones for the occasion. James Lackeye does the picture's best work, but Florence Radinoff is very close to him in truth, and Norma Talmadge is charming in her interpretation of the situation's emotional content. Frank O'Neil, as the young man, is fine, except in his entrance into the room after he has been adopted by the old man, who plays his role with quiet dignity. There is much credit due the producer, Van Dyke Brooke, for his direction of the players, which is perfect. A desirable release.

"JAPANESE DANCES" (Melies), July 24.—We are at a loss just how to recommend these dances, taken in Java and by native professional dancers. It is fairly clear in photography and will be highly educational to many. Yet many of the dances are hard to interpret, and the early parts of the exhibition seem a bit tiresome. Closing the film, we have the "Dance of the Horses," which, with "The Monkey Dance," is most amusing to civilized eyes. The last dance is grotesque and made the audience howl with laughter. There was emphatic applause.

"A KNIFE OF FIRE" (Edison), July 23.—The acetylene gas flame in its wonderful applications is shown by the clear photographs of this picture. For instance, we see it cutting its way through a big piece of armor plate. The people seem very glad of these instructive pictures.

"AT MIDNIGHT" (Edison), July 23.—A farce comedy that comes after a noise in the house. Auntie (Alice Washburn) thinks it is burglars. It was a mousetrap that, in springing, stumbled. Edward Boulden, the family's hopeful but careless son, had come home late, rather drunk, and placed it where it was likely to fall. Aunty's cries waken the whole family (William Wadsworth and Mrs. C. J. Williams with the children) and there's a comical burglar hunt in which Edward O'Connor, the cop on the beat, assists. The picture doesn't reach any grand height of fun; but made good laughter and seemed to please the audience very well indeed. It is excellently photographed and commendably handled in all ways. The script is by Mark Swan.

"AN ERROR IN KIDNAPPING" (Vitagraph), July 23.—Hughie Mack, as an unwilling father and in a banker's beard, has refused Wallie Van the hand of his daughter (Edith Nash), and the youngsters have agreed to have Wallie's friends steal her. Edith's sister, Alice, is away at college; but comes home at the inopportune time and is mistaken by these friends for her sister whom Wallie wants stolen. There is trouble and it all ends in the police station; but it has been handled very cleverly by both author, Theodore Weeks, and producer, Frederick Thomson, and is amusing all through, while at its best, it is laughter compelling, making a very good picture, the best comedy to-day, and a desirable offering.

"THE UNSEEN DEFENSE" (Selig), July 23.—In this picture, written by Alfred Corey, and produced by Fred Huntley, a lonely Union soldier stands at his post singing, to encourage himself, the old hymn, "Cover My Defenseless Head with the Shadow of Thy Wing." A squad of Confederates has been crawling up to the outpost and intend "getting" the sentry; but they hear the song and, though aiming, withdraw their guns and leave him singing. This incident has been made effective by exciting our sympathy for the soldier (Hobart Bosworth) through the simplest means—we have been made acquainted with his folks at home and have been told something of his love story. Stories of this kind affect many people deeply and this offering will doubtless be popular. It should be effective with the help of music. The photography is rather dull.

"THE TENDERFOOT'S LUCK" (Kalem), July 23.—A light-hearted comedy and romance that both interests and amuses. The Western rough-necks, among them John Brennan, have fun with Marshal Neilan, the tenderfoot, and "plant" a gilt-paint mine for him. The rough-necks love Ruth Roland, who sees Marshal, laughs at his outfit and at his find, and then falls in love with him. She helps him locate a real mine. It makes a good, light offering; the photography is only fair, a slight picture that will be liked.

"HISTORIC SAVANNAH, GEORGIA" (Kalem), July 23.—On the same reel is this interesting bit, in which one item is a view of the "Hermitage," since 1819 the fine, old family home of the McAlpins. It is an excellent specimen of the dignified homestead of the South and well worth seeing. A view of St. John's Church, of Savannah, where President Wilson was married, is included, with other scenes taken in the city. The photography is acceptable.

"A FALSE ACCUSATION" (Patheplay), July 23.—The story, set in a big contractor's camp, is good and is effectively told. A jealous drunkard makes trouble in the camp and is fired, vowing vengeance. The foreman's baby, "a live dollie," is stolen by a little Indian boy and carried off into the woods. The drunkard is suspected and nearly hanged. The horror of a big snake is cleverly woven into the action. The photography is rather dull, but is clear enough to keep the story going. The players add not a little to the humanity of the picture by natural acting. A very fair offering.

"THE DANCE AT EAGLE PASS" (Essanay), July 23.—It is, seemingly, a long time before this story gets down to business and before the villain gets marked definitely off from the hero. At its best, the villain is too simple to seem really dangerous and so the plot is not truly effective or dramatic. It is naturally acted and the photography is very clear.

"HOME, SWEET HOME" (Lubin), July 23.—A two-reel special picture of sentiment and dealing with the affection of two people for the old home and home surroundings, things they have grown old with. The married son and his wife try to make things more comfortable for them but succeed only in making them homesick for the old house, furniture and the old horse. Mrs. George B. Walters plays the old lady, and her work really makes the picture, although she is very well supported. The same sentiment (sweet, natural, human and true as it is), given through the two reels that are not very dramatic and never raise suspense very high, is or becomes a bit tiresome—the picture seems to us a long two reels. Yet every one of the players is distinctly good company at all times. Bartley McCullum plays opposite to Mrs. Walters, and Harry Myers plays their son, with Ethel Clayton as the wife. The photography and sets are excellent. Edwin Barbour is the author; Barry O'Neil, the producer.

"THE EXILE" (Lubin), July 25.—A story that has been told and retold; but we hardly dare say that its whole charm comes from the players, sets and photography, for the audience seemed to watch it with interest. The rich girl in the East is pretty, she is taken by Isabelle Lamon; the Western girl, Jennie Nelson, has personality and is most pleasing in this role. Harry Myers plays the man who goes to the West to make a fortune and so win the rich girl. John Ince plays the rich man that she marries after the report comes that Harry is dead. The picture has its good, melodramatic moments and its obviously improbable things.

"VIPERS AT HOME" (Patheplay), July 25.—Perhaps this is the most sensational picture of to-day; it is full of crawls, both real and imaginary. It is also instructive and may be very useful to many. We learn that any snake that gives birth to live young is a viper and that there are many kinds of them. The famous and very terrible "bushmaster," of South America is shown, and other less deadly kinds. We are shown them, caught and squirming, and shown how to tend a snake bite. The photography is perfect. No one will count this a slow film.

"A TRIP TO THE GROTTOES OF BAUME" (Patheplay), July 25.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this travel film. It is hand-colored and, though the definition is only fair, it has much picturesqueness and beauty. The value of an offering such as this, to those who cannot travel is very high and we know that there are many who are most thankful for them.

"THE ACID TEST" (Selig), July 25.—The story of this picture, by W. A. Corey, we find interesting; there is a new situation in it that is made very effective on the screen by the clearness with which sympathetic ink develops. As shown, the story is full of quite impossible inconsistencies and they make the offering weak. It is not very strong in its acting. The photography is clear.

"THE TABLES TURNED" (Vitagraph), July 25.—A little study of human life, not great, but acceptable and interesting. Kate Price is that kind of invalid who, when no one is looking, will slip down to the pantry. She has the tantrums and is making life a burden for her sister, Mrs. B. F. Clinton, and her two nieces, Dorothy Kelly and Norman Talmadge. The picture shows us how she behaved and then how she is cured. It is amusing and seemed to please. Winifred Dutcher wrote the script which Charles Kent produced. It is clearly photographed.

"HONOR THY FATHER AND THY MOTHER" (Cines), July 25.—This two-part special has been reviewed at length in a former issue, see page 309, July 19, 1913..

"THE MEADOW LARK" (Edison), July 25.—We find this picture only fairly entertaining. The best scenes are very good, but most of it is not strong and its worst is unworthy of the Edison studio. The good part (sets and acting) is that portraying theatrical life; the country love story merely affords pretty out-door scenes that are not very well photographed. The climax, where the minister finds the singing girl, the "Meadow Lark," at the vaudeville and she faints in his arms, is hardly sensible. There is a very poor letter in it, too—how few good letters we notice out of Vitagraph pictures.

"MAKING GOOD" (Essanay), July 25.—In part, this is a very interesting offering; it shows us an actor getting a job with the Essanay people and how he makes good in a picture and finally his being congratulated by his associates. It was dangerous to show them enthusiastic before the audience who seemed to count the congratulation a joke. The taking of the scenes was worth seeing; the final result not so good. The photography is clear.

"BAFFLED, NOT BEATEN" (Kalem), July 25.—The story is weak and full of improbabilities. Rich father promises his daughter to a young lawyer when he wins his first big case. District attorney assigns young man to prosecute a suit against the rich father. Young man writes to girl announcing the fact and adding that, for safekeeping, he is carrying the important documents always with him. The spectator wonders whether he is a traitor to his party. Did he have no safe? Did he want the girl to know where the documents were, so that she could have them stolen to save the father? The girl loses the letter, then lets the man know that it is lost. Father finds the letter, and his "famous" lawyer has the man blackjacked and the papers (they were now dummies) stolen. The trial is called and the man having come-to in the hospital is on his way; but hasn't telephoned. The judge refuses the district attorney's plea for a postponement (it is City against Railroad), and is about to declare the suit forfeited when the man comes in, hands the real papers to the judge and gets his verdict before the father can cool down. This is nothing less than ridiculous.

"DR. CATHERN'S EXPERIMENT" (Vitagraph), July 28.—There is nothing very new in the situations that develop in this picture; but it has been carefully made, has some extremely pretty scenes, and sets forth a tender sentiment that will make a strong appeal to many spectators. The doctor (Ned Finley) is a cripple and ugly looking—his face doesn't attract the spectator even. He has discovered a blind girl (Beatrice McKay) who is being compelled to beg and is ill-treated. He adopts her and has had her taught to play the piano. In time, he falls in love with her and she returns his affection; but before the marriage, a fellow practitioner finds a new cure and she has her sight restored. Her benefactor is afraid she will not be able to love him since she can now see him, but his fears prove to be empty. The script, by W. A. Tremayne, has been produced by Van Dyke Brooke. It is a well-acted offering.

"THE COMING OF ANGELO" (Biograph), July 26.—A picture taken near the sea and in a high wind; the billows are tumbling over a rocky shore. The photography is fair. The story offers old elements in a fresh arrangement and, at its climax, lets us watch a clock creeping to the moment that will explode a bomb. This kills not the hero, but the villain, the man who set it. The girl is Blanche Sweet. There is a good deal to commend in the acting and the picture will make a serviceable offering.

"THE GIRL AND THE GANGSTER" (Kalem), July 28.—A two part special offering, giving us a story of the under-world. It has a bomb explosion at its climax. The story is a bit slow, in parts, and might, perhaps, have been better in one reel; but it has been very ably handled, especially the explosion and, indeed, the whole second reel. The gangster is played by Carlyle Blackwell, and his sweetheart, a girl who has a hard time at home with her rough father, by Marin Sais. Both of these players carry the situation well. The character study, the man's mother, is taken by Jane Wolfe, whose work gives the only real poignant moments to the picture. The man's younger brother was very poor; he spoilt the scene in which he tells the mother that the gangster has been arrested. Perhaps he was too old for the part he was told to portray. The photography is good. The picture has enough quality to be commendable as a good special offering.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 36," July 28.—The photography seems a bit weak this issue, but the items are full of fresh interest and it makes a good offering.

"THE STOLEN FACE" (Selig), July 28.—A picture of Japan and America. The Occidentals who take the roles of the Japanese are not impressive and the early parts of it seem bare of illusion to the point of being uninteresting. The climax of the plot will hold the attention; it is at least reasonable and well acted. The author is Gilson Willets, and the producer Oscar Eagle. Tom Carrigan made the artist, the picture's "goat," seems rather silly. Adrienne Kroel, as the girl with whom he is in love, had little chance to act, except at the end, where she does very well. Charles Clary's Senator Slade is acceptable, but we were not impressed by Frank Weed's General Oki. The photography is clear. A not very strong offering.

"BRONCHO BILLY AND THE SCHOOLMA'AM'S SWEETHEART" (Essanay), July 26.—In quality, this story is like others of the series; not quite so good as the best of them. Broncho Billy, G. M. Anderson, as Sheriff, saves a weakling, whom the schoolma'am loves, from a lynch law hanging—he had been persuaded by a villain to take part in a rustling bee and had been caught. At the end, Broncho, who also loves the schoolma'am, looks in through the window and sees her with her arms around the weakling. Some of the scenes are lovely; but the photography of many of the exteriors is obscure.

"THE PRICE DEMANDED" (Lubin), July 26.—A very sensational melodramatic picture with a climax that gets over effectively, but that may offend many sensitive spectators; it is a situation that is almost disgusting, when one thinks of it. A burglar, who has a grudge against a man, finds him in a house with his sweetheart. They are to be married next day. As the price of his not killing the man he demands the girl and the girl consents, but is saved from him. The picture is perfectly photographed and there are some really lovely sets in it, but the plot is not strong. It begins with an improbable crime and capture; all of its criminals are most unlikely people. Again, some of its scenes are very carefully produced, especially toward the end. For the gallery and for certain localities, it should go very well, but not in special places. The script, by Emmet Campbell Hall, was produced by Barry O'Neil. Harry Myers and Ethel Clayton play the romantic leads.

"THE SPELL" (Vitagraph), July 26.—There is some taint of morbidity in the opening situation of this picture; but in its working out it is optimistic and healthy. The author is Edwin August and the producer Rollo Sturgeon. Mary Charleson plays a girl who is engaged to a doctor (Edwin August). A quack and hypnotist (Mr. Holt) comes to town, and with the help of Mary's chum (Miss Gonzales) gets her under his power. The development of this situation is interesting and not offensive, but we dare not call it a strong or beautiful offering. In photography, it is not perfectly clear.

"A PROPOSAL FROM THE DUKE" (Edison), July 26.—This picture opens a new series, called "Who Will Marry Mary?" It is a very commendable offering as entertainment to the public. Most of us can imagine, or have a pipe dream of inheriting unexpectedly a great fortune and find it a pleasant relaxation. It is just as delightful to watch Mary (we put ourselves in her place) enjoying her new riches, her country house, friends and all that goes with good fortune. If this series holds up well, it will, we predict, be even a better trump card than the former Mary pictures. At present, there are many suitors for Mary's attention. One of them, a duke, is effectively disposed of and we think that most spectators will be making their choice of favorite bridegroom in Capt. Bradford. The scenes are well chosen, fairly photographed and interesting. It is directed by Walter Edwin. Mary Fuller, of course, takes the titular role. Richard Tucker plays the foreign duke and Benjamin Wilson is playing Capt. Bradford, a clean-cut American. They have the interesting parts in this picture and carry their parts well.

"THE GREED OF OSMAN BEY" (Edison), July 28.—In its settings and its backgrounds this is a splendid picture. It is well acted and graceful, especially in its love scenes in a luxurious garden. The story, after dragging in the early part, works out to an ending full of suspense and makes a very fair offering to the public. The photoplay is very fair indeed. It was produced by Richard Ridgley from the script of M. M. Katterjohn. Barry O'Moore plays the greedy Bey and his lovely daughter (Gertrude McCoy) is to be married to a rich merchant (Charles Sutton). Bigelow Cooper, as a prince from over the desert, sees her and gets into trouble trying, in a not strongly convincing way, to win her—he is walled up in a cell and left to die, when word comes that his father is dead and he is a very rich prince, so the Bey sets him free and he gives more gold for the girl than the merchant could. The backgrounds are very good and the picture goes very well as an offering.

"THE VENGEANCE OF GALORA" (Biograph), July 28.—A picture with a "Western" love story and stage hold-up. The climax is such as will hold the attention on the screen, although the plot is complex and it must be watched carefully in the first scenes, which may seem, to some, a bit slow. The photography is not clear-cut, yet doesn't hinder the story. The acting is very fair, but offers nothing of special merit. On the whole, a very fair commercial offering.

"THE FLYING SWITCH" (Kalem), July 28.—Railroad pictures have some advantage over ordinary offerings. In them, the train and the locomotive themselves have parts and they spell romance to a great many folks. This one will make a fair offering, but the Kalem Company has given us much better railroad stories. The situation is not very rich in possibilities, for it is only money that is at stake and, then, it has one or two weak scenes that keep the story from convincing us. It also has some very good scenes. The photography is not up to Kalem standard.

"THE MOONSHINER'S MISTAKE" (Kalem), July 26.—A picture dealing with illicit whiskey making, but with no revenue men. It is a tragedy worked out by the mountain folk themselves, though there is a man from the city, a sportsman, who witnesses it. The moonshiner is begged by his sweetheart to give up making the whisky and refuses. At the end of the picture he sees someone demolishing his still and fires before he reognizes that it is the girl. There is some excellent photography and some of the scenes are full of beauty. The players fill their parts acceptably. It makes a commercial offering.

"THE MAD SCULPTOR" (Patheplay); July 26.—A sensational picture in which Octavia Handworth seems to take great risks. She, as the picture's heroine, is wounded by an accidental shot from her husband's gun, and falling, hangs, foot-caught, over the saddle while the horse trots home. Because of the accident, the husband (Crane Wilbur) goes mad, falls into the hands of the villain (William Cavanaugh) who, on his death, will inherit a fortune. The villain tries to make it seem that the mad sculptor has drowned himself, but the poor man, who has been kept in a cabin in the woods, recovers. It was taken near an Adirondack lake and is perfectly photographed. The plot is clear, but the story is not very strong.

"THE BELLS" (Edison), July 29.—Few Edisons have been weaker than this country village story of love and heroics. The time is before the war and Poe's famous poem is dragged in (it certainly has nothing to do with the story) perhaps to make it seem poetical. Augustus Phillips, the hero, can do much more natural work than this—such melodramatic playing is not pleasing to the people any more. There is no illusion of danger in the burning church and no sincerity in the love making. George Lessey produced it.

"TROUBLESOME DAUGHTERS" (Vitagraph), July 29.—The Vitagraph Company has utilized the Nash twins in another comedy picture which made a good deal of genuine laughter and seemed to please the audience. It is pleasantly amusing, but not great. The plot is very simple and not dramatic at all; but shows clearly that the father (James Lackeye) couldn't, while the aunt (Mrs. Mary Maurice) could take care of the two girls (Alice and Edna Nash). Gladden James and Wallie Van are the two boys, their sweethearts. It was produced by Frederick Thomson from W. A. Tremayne's script. The photography is clear.

"THE CALL OF THE PLAINS" (Essanay), July 29.—Two people who love each other are kept apart by the loss of a letter, which the wind blows from the counter of the village postoffice. The letter is found years later and this lets in a happy ending. That this incident has been used in other pictures is more than made up for by the careful, natural and human way the action has been conducted. It is a good release and gave this reviewer more pleasure than any other offering today; we like it a good deal. Arthur Mackley and Jane Selby have the leading roles. The photography is very good.

"CURIOUS SEA CREATURES" (Patheplay), July 29.—There is as much entertainment as instruction in such offerings as this and they are full of instruction. It gives clear pictures of the sea lily, a queer creature if there ever was one and beautiful withal. Then comes the sea cucumber, they are all animals, and after this, we see the sea slug, a salt water snail. The bonillia is a long (18 feet) worm found in the waters of southern Europe and is like a nightmare. Clear pictures of the sea horse are also shown. A good offering.

"DAILY DOINGS AT MANILA" (Patheplay), July 29.—The photography is fair and the pictures pretty well chosen. There is nothing especially noteworthy in this offering, nothing that marks it out from others of its kind.

"THE WIDOW'S WILES" (Lubin), July 28.—Robert Burns and Walter Stull, in this picture, play two old cronies. The former has a son (George Reehm), the latter has a daughter (Frances Ne Moyer) and the young people are engaged. The widow (Mae Hotely) comes in a stylish plush dress and two old men lose their heads over her; fall out, and try to break up the love story of the young people. It is not wholly new, but some new things are rung in, and it makes a very fair offering, because the players seem to be in good spirit for fun making and the situation gave them a good chance. The audience seemed to like it very much. Arthur Hotaling produced it from the script of Epes W. Sargent.

"RASTUS AMONG THE ZULUS" (Lubin), July 28.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this slight but lively and very acceptable picture, an extravagant farce. The scenes are like those in other recent Zulu offerings by the same company and producer, and it has much the same kind of action. It was produced by Arthur Hotaling from his own script.

"THE CALL OF THE HEART" (Lubin), July 29.—We have reviewed another picture with this same plot within three years and, if our memory holds, it was much more convincing and entertaining then than now. The acting this time is poor in some of its important scenes and this takes the edge off the story. The producer is George Nicholls. Edwin Carew and Ormi Hawley have the romantic leads. The photography is fair.

"HENRIETTA'S HAIR" (Selig), July 29.—The story is weakly worked up and, in itself, does not give much illusion of reality; is unconvincing. The players and the clear photographs help it some and it has one or two novel things, like that shoemaker-justice of the peace (he is markedly out of place in a city, where the story is set). Charles France produced it from the script of Hamilton Osborne. Adrienne Kroell plays the girl who has real hair and Alma Russell the girl who has to buy hers. Palmer Bowman plays the man who marries the hair (that's what he does). Lyllian Leighton is the hair seller.

"BORROWING TROUBLE" (Selig), July 29.—We saw something amusing in this picture; but cannot tell all of what it is about, mostly because it is, in large part, too improbable to believe. There were some in the audience who got one laugh from it. It is on the same reel with the foregoing and by the same producer.

"A PRINCE OF EVIL" (Vitagraph), July 26.—Here is a great story, portrayed in a manner that will make the picture remembered by all who see it. There are two reels of straight drama—not a line of comedy in it. It would be difficult to overpraise the acting of those who make this picture—for it is in the interpretation of the script that the chief distinction of this film lies. There are five persons who do the brunt of the work. They are L. Rogers Lytton, Edith Storey, E. K. Lincoln, Harry Northrup and Anita Stewart. The second reel is a succession of big situations. The climax—where Miss Storey goes to her married sister, Miss Stewart, and, unaware that her brother-in-law, Mr. Northrup, is present in the room, asks how "it is all going to end"—is one of unusual power. The appeal of the gambling but otherwise innocent wife for the forgiveness of her husband is a dramatic gem. The thought would not, will not, down: What possibilities there are in this play and with this cast for the stage? No man or woman concerned with the art of dramatic expression should miss seeing "A Prince of Evil."

"A CHILD'S INFLUENCE" (Crystal), August 5.—The story told by this film is not up to standard as a drama or as a moral interpretation of life; it is weak, artistically and ethically. Good photography and clever acting go for little in making such a story entertaining. Pearl White and Chester Barnett have the leading roles.

"WHEN THE PRINCE ARRIVED" (Rex), August 7.—A familiar, but engaging, situation leads this film, wherein the circus acrobat quarrels with a partner and thinks he has committed murder. He escapes with a posse at his heels, but the romantic farm girl hides him. He becomes the prince of her dreams, but in the end she has to give him up and she then throws her book of fairy stories into the stream. An entertaining offering, though not very new in plot.

"A BRAND FROM THE BURNING" (Frontier), August 2.—There is nothing in this picture of Western stuff especially to recommend it—in story, in acting or in photography.

"GREASE PAINT INDIANS" (Eclair), August 3.—A unique Indian comedy made by William Haddock's company in Oklahoma last winter. In the cast were Lamar Johnstone and Hal Wilson. A company of French moving picture actors come into the Indian country to make an Indian picture. The company is attacked by red men. It is a burlesque, of course, but it will make a lot of fun.

"THE HOLY CITIES OF JAPAN" (Eclair), August 3.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this short scenic, containing interesting tinted views of interesting bits of Mikadoland.

"THE SCHOOL KID'S PICNIC (Majestic), July 27.—A half reel, showing the Majestic company in bathing, having fun with the "principal." Only fairly amusing.

"THE WILD WEST COMES TO TOWN" (Majestic), July 27.—Merely a few pictures of one of the various Wild West shows in action, filling out the above reel.

"TEMPESTA" (Majestic), August 2.—A film story of rather uncertain atmosphere, the first scenes being apparently laid in a Spanish prison. Tempesta escapes, through the sacrifice of a friend, and 18 years later discovers his daughter. He cannot make himself known to her. The scene in the studio was quite appealing and the story fairly strong.

"PROF. BEAN'S REMOVAL" (Keystone), July 31.—Quite an amusing number, in the rough style of this company's well-known nonsense. Mabel and Ford practice so violently on their trombones that the neighbors move the house one evening. An actual moving house is shown, and it is some time before the audience learns what is going on. Something new and different, without any particular offensiveness.

"COHEN'S OUTING (Keystone), August 4.—A fairly amusing number, showing Cohen and his wife at a summer resort. She pursues him over the Figure 8 and other tortuous concessions of the kind. A few situations are quite funny.

"IN THE NICK OF TIME" (Thanhouser), August 1.—The husband is sent to escort a woman buyer. His wife, being informed of this by a jealous clerk, charges her husband with infidelity. That night the child turns the gas on, for no apparent reason, and the father comes just in time to save it. The plot of this is not as strong as it might be.

"THE TOY" (Majestic), July 29.—A man thrown into the workhouse for stealing a doll for his child steals vegetables from the workhouse garden and hands them through the iron fence to his wife. This latter situation seemed novel and interesting, but the ending of the story was not very effective.

"REUNITED AT GETTYSBURG" (Imp), August 4.—This story was written for the purpose of using the great reunion at Gettysburg in July as a background. The opening scenes show the veterans arriving by train. There is a fine panoramic view of the encampment, with the thousands of tents, undoubtedly the record area of canvas in the United States since the days of the Civil War. The picture easily goes over on the strength of the settings.

"A HASTY JILTING" (Frontier), July 31.—A comedy so true to certain phases of courtship that it holds the attenion well. The girl gives back her ring because her fiance chats with other girls. Later, when she is in the West with her invalid mother, he writes her that he has struck it rich and still wants her. Just before receiving this letter she has mailed another epistle accepting a different suitor. Her race to recover this letter is very amusing. Static rays appear in several places in the film. We should have left off the last line, "Nobody loves a fat man," as it has done yeoman service in vaudeville. Breezy and enjoyable.

"SOUL TO SOUL" (Eclair), July 30.—In spite of strong acting and good direction, this picture leaves the observer with an impression of having gained but little from its perusal. The situations develop well, and one sees the young wife placed where she must either expose her father for the killing of Dago Bill, or see her husband stand the blame. She chooses the latter course. The husband loses his mind temporarily and there are a lot of unpleasant—almost repulsive—scenes. Three years later, when he regains his sanity, he pursues her with his terrifying glance until the truth is forced from her. Even then there is no happiness for them, and the picture closes with him walking away down the road, and the father being taken to jail.

"ANIMATED WEEKLY, NO. 72" (Universal), July 30.—Full of interesting subjects, but the photography might have been clearer in places.

"WILLIE, THE WILD MAN" (Thanhouser), July 27.—Quite an original offering is this, wherein the young man, advised by his father to quit playing poker and go to work, hires out as wild man for the hotel. He falls in love with the millionaire's daughter, but cannot get the father's consent. He proceeds to capture the millionaire, as the wild man, and later comes to the rescue in his own proper person. All of which makes a good yarn.

"LITTLE DORRIT" (Thanhouser), July 29.—A two-reel production of the famous Dickens' story, with Maude Fealcy in the leading role. She gives us a charming impersonation, but the dramatic values of the story were not brought out at all adequately. The first reel was given up entirely to developing the atmosphere and setting, which it succeeded in doing very nicely, but in the second reel the incidents which should have been worked up strongly were almost glossed over, so that very little impression is made upon the observer. The banquet scene is fairly good, but the finding of Arthur in the prison was weakly led up to and the love interest lacked feeling.

"THE ADVENTURES OF MR. PIFFLE (Imp), August 9.—A short series of Mr. Mayer's drawings in pen and ink, to appear on same reel with "The Cook Question." Diverting.

"THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH" (Powers), August 6.—The idle young wife thinks more of her dog than she does of her child, but she reads the poem of "The Village Blacksmith" and this gives her a change of heart. We liked the illustrations of the poem very well, but its use in this occasion seemed rather irrelevant; some other poem might have applied to the situation more effectively. The photography is good.

"THE HEART OF THE HEATHEN (Powers), August 8.—Edwin August here gives a convincing characterization of a Chinaman in a two-reel offering. The white man befriends him when his laundry burns, by saving his sacred horn from the flames. Woo becomes his faithful slave and later saves the daughter of the woman he loves from the Chinese Tong. The story moves along quietly until toward the last and holds the interest nicely.

"THE SECOND HOME-COMING" (Nestor), August 4.—A plot of clearly defined type, a type that succeeds because of the human truth in its moral lesson. In this case it is fairly done and ought to be acceptable. The daughter of the country boarding house keeper has been educated above her station and is dissatisfied with things when she first comes home; but she tries her fortune in the city and meets with trouble. Afterward, she is truly thankful for home and mother.

"JOE HIBBARD'S CLAIM" (Broncho), August 6.—Joe writes his mother he has struck a rich claim. As a matter of fact, he is a "high-grader," or ore thief. She comes West just after he has been killed after an exciting gun fight. This is something like real Western life and quite well pictured.

"THE HOUSE OF BONDAGE" (Kay-Bee), August 8.—A three-part story of Colonial days, well acted and carefully presented throughout. We followed the fortunes of Hope and her Puritan lover with great interest. Her expulsion from the Puritan home for breaking a dish was convincingly portrayed, as well as the attempt to convict her of sorcery. Hope and her lover fare forth into the country, only to come back and save their former friends when they discover the Indians approaching. The last two reels are full of spirited fighting and grip the observer strongly. A good offering.

"THE HONOR OF LADY BEAUMONT" (Eclair), August 6.—A strong two-reel offering along the line of the stories of the Northwest which this company used to produce. Barbara Tennant, J. W. Johnston and Guy Hedlund appear, assisted by the entire company. The story is one which instantly grips the attention and is very successfully worked out. It relates just how Sir Dorian Mars happens to be a squaw man in the Northwest and why he chooses to stay there, both for his own honor and that of Lady Beaumont. There is some excellent scenery thrown on the screen and the thrills are legitimate and acceptable. The escape down the river in a motor boat is especially attractive. A fine offering.

"THE SNAKE" (Bison), August 9.—A two-reel offering, picturing very realistically the snake dances of the Hopi Indians. There are snakes aplenty in this number and Mona's lover engages in a curious test of nerve with the Indian rival, when both sit with bared arms waiting to see which the rattler will strike. Most interesting are the scenes when the Hopi's dance with snakes in their mouths and twined about them. A strong offering of the sensational type.

"NATURE'S VENGEANCE (Victor), August 8.—The stranger wrongs a girl and when he would desert her, she rushes to the house to get a gun with which to shoot him. He is overtaken and forced to marry her, but later his canoe is upset in the rapids and he is drowned. Not a very pleasant story, but strongly handled, with James Kirkwood and Gertrude Robinson in the leading roles.

"A MODERN ROMANCE" (Imp), August 7.—A young man, taken ill on the street, is sent to a hospital, where he falls in love with his nurse. His father disapproves of the match, but they are married. The situation where he loses his money on Wall Street and draws a gun out of the bureau draw with which to kill himself has been done so many times that it is threadbare. The father's sickness seemed to us overdrawn and there was not enough freshness about the story to make it very appealing.

"BOB'S BABY" (Gem), August 4.—A very amusing comedy number, in which the young husband becomes enraged because of his wife's love for canine pets. When she wires him to come and see the new baby and he finds another puppy, he goes to his uncle's in disgust. Later, when the real baby comes, he thinks it is a dog and takes home a collar and chain. The appearance of the real baby, of course, delights him very much. Quite a successful little comedy.

"AS WE SOW" (Solax), July 25.—A picture exploiting a topic that is not without an appeal to a large number of spectators. It is not a strong story; but we find clear photography and several very pretty scenes. Marian Swayne plays a poor girl who loves finery. She is tempted by a fast woman, an acquaintance, and would have fallen into the mire had it not been for a kind-hearted woman (Blanche Cornwall) who has sinned and repented. The men are Darwin Karr and Fraunie Fraunholz.

"ALMOST A RESCUE" (Nestor), August 8.—A lively burlesque farce that has several astonishing situations and makes a good deal of laughter. It deals with some young people (two girls and a man) in a theatrical boarding house in New York, who, it happens, are unable to pay their board bills. The man misunderstands an overheard conversation of the girls and gets some burlesque sleuths on the job with comical results. It is cleverly acted and will amuse.

"CIVILIZED AND SAVAGE" (Rex), August 3.—Lois Weber and Phillips Smalley put on a drama of unusual strength. The strength is in the acting of the two. Smalley portrays a white man taken ill at a point where there is no medical assistance. His wife leaves him for a section more comfortable. Miss Weber has the role of a savage who nurses back to convalescence the man who cannot see, hear or speak. Then she goes for the wife. The portrayal of the savage is one that will make wide appeal. The characterization of the sick man and the savage woman in love with him is carefully thought out and artistically executed.

"A RESOURCEFUL LOTHARIO" (Gaumont), July 31.—Not very amusing. A persistent male flirt, not young, follows a woman into her home. When the husband enters he finds a stranger—who had heard him coming—demanding reparation for a damaged hat and coat, the result of a bump from a flower pot alleged to have fallen from a window ledge. The husband replaces hat and coat and gives the supposedly injured man money—all of which the wife permits. The fact that the flirt later buys and forwards to the wife a hat he had seen her admiring hardly squares the account.

"A TROMBONE MARATHON" (Gaumont), July 10.—A man plays a trombone for twenty-four hours continuously. He is working on a wager. The people in the house object and manifest their indignation quite naturally. They wreck the house, but they do not kill the disturber. It will amuse juveniles.

"THE COAT CAME BACK" (Solax), July 30.—Slim comedy. The story is of a coat which a young couple tried hard to get rid of, but which somehow always came back to them. Finally they ripped it up and discovered that it contained wealth left there by the relative who had willed the garment.

"AT THE FOOT OF THE SCAFFOLD" (Kineto).—Very unpleasant melodrama. One of the features is a burglar-murder, in which is held up to view a dripping knife. The story is unfitted for exhibitors with houses at all select. In short, it is of a clerk who buys a paper cutter for his sister's present. The gift is left in the office of an evening. Later a burglar enters the place, is looking at the knife as the employer enters, intoxicated, to spend the night there. The burglar commits murder. The clerk returns to get the knife and is arrested. The burglar later gets into a barroom brawl and is sent to jail for two years. In attempting to escape he is shot, and, wounded, enters the home of the clerk's mother, where he confesses. The clerk is about to be executed; then comes the effort to save him, which, of course, is successful.

"THE LOVE ROMANCE OF SIR FRANCIS DRAKE" (Kineto).—The best that can be said of this picture is that it has fine backgrounds. There are good costumes, too. The producer had present the elements of a most interesting picture, but he has failed to make it impressive. There is absent in the two reels a holding quality. Drake is played fairly well; the sweetheart is interesting; Sir John overdoes his villainy; the queen fails to contribute toward the creation of courtly atmosphere.

"WHEN THE TIDE TURNS (Solax), August 1.—A comedy-drama that is weak in plot. The story is of an old man who is turned out by relatives. He has inspired regard in the heart of a widow, who cannot marry without sacrificing her inheritance. Nevertheless, she takes pity on the old chap and takes him to her home. He gets word of a legacy of $40,000, marries the widow, and throws out the family when it comes to take care of him.

"TINY TIM STEALS AN ELEPHANT" (Gaumont), August 12.—Good comedy. Little Tim and his elephant, John Willy by name, have a lot of funny adventures, which will closely hold the attention of people of all ages.

"THE LAKES OF SALZBURG" (Gaumont), August 12.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this very finely photographed scenic. There are views of smooth lakes, of castles, and great mountains in the background.

"FROM OUT THE DEPTHS" (American Kineto).—Two reels of ordinary melodrama. The story is of a factory worker who marries. He gets drunk, knocks down his wife and, thinking her dead, runs away. He is jailed for stealing bread. He gets into the clutches of a crook, who induces him to break into a house. While trying to force open a safe he is surprised by his wife, employed in the house as a maid. Reformation follows. Many of the scenes fade instead of ending abruptly, which adds to the artistic value of the picture. The leading man has a most pleasing personality; he should become a favorite if given proper scripts. The photography is good.

"A WOMAN SCORNED" (Great Northern).—There is a strange note of suspense in this two-part picture as the old mill burns. There are many fine views of landscape and shaded road, excellently photographed. The story is of the old triangular order, with a vengeful woman who is disappointed. It will hold all the way. A strong picture.

"THE BRIDE OF THE SEA" (Dragon), July 28.—The acting in this picture does not match up with the photographic work. Neither does the direction. One factor of the picture will be noted—a wireless plant in operation. This was built into the studio.

"The Waif" and "The House of Bondage."

A Brace of Stirring Kay-Bees.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

"THE WAIF" presents a pathetic situation in such an interesting manner, with such skill of preparation, that the relief comes all too soon. The story is so well told by the author that one reel is only an appetizer. I fully expected two or more and felt a sense of disappointment when the fading came. A heroic young girl is seen supporting her brother in a desert sand storm. He is on the verge of death at the opening and his end leaves his helpless sister at the mercy of circumstances. Her courage is purely feminine, and when she uses some of his clothes in an attempted disguise she is still so feminine that we are not called upon to swallow any supposed deception upon members of the other sex. Great idea to let things be as they are in real life.

Scene from "The House of Bondage" (Kay-Bee).

She—in this case Miss Anna Little—comes upon a prospector's hut, and he comes upon her with amusing consequences. There is an intimate connection between Miss Little and any role she assumes, and the gravity with which she assumes it helps materially to unite character, action and the plot every moment she is in evidence. A swift friendship springs up between her and the prospector that admits of such delightful possibilities as are raised in Winthrop's "Cecil Dreeme," but they are on the border, where surprising situations follow one another so closely that one has scarcely time to catch his breath, where passions are painted in primary colors, out there where pretty girls grow on every bush according to the screen, so a stirring play of motion and emotion naturally results.

Scene from "The House of Bondage" (Kay-Bee).

"The House of Bondage."

"The House of Bondage" is another photodrama characterized by tremendous activity, though it deals with slow and headstrong ancestors of ours who founded colonies at Salem and Boston. Great care is constantly visible in costumes and settings, down to the smallest details, so that there is an educational value in this three-reel feature that was possibly not considered in its design. It is a picture of the times and of the almost merciless nature of those who were religiously strict and pretended great purity in life. Two of them a man and wife, whose son is completing his education in England, are given charge of an orphaned girl and reluctantly accord her shelter. She is treated with that refinement of cruelty which made the Puritan the most dangerous enemy the redman ever had, and which has been a destroyer of happiness wherever it has persisted in Americans of to-day. She survives to prove herself made of heroic material only to meet an undeserved end after shaming those participating in the ill-treatment she receives.

Anna Little assumes the important role and plays it so well that her face and figure make an impression on the mind both pathetic and lasting. Her vital characterization carries the play along with so much delicate sympathy that one cannot help feeling that she is a veritable artiste. Perhaps she is not—that remains to be seen—but indications point that way. The charm about her personality as revealed on the screen is its abundant femininity and essential womanliness. Her attitude towards her calling is a serious one, and she has helped decidedly to make "The House of Bondage" a success.

A NEW FEATURE COMPANY IN THE FIELD.

The True Feature Company, a corporation organized under the laws of New York, has opened a suite of offices on the seventh floor of the World's Tower Building, 110-112 West 40th Street. Here the new corporation will distribute the releases of the Continental Art Film Society of Berlin. The True Feature Company, besides being the sole American and Canadian agent of the Continental, has optional rights on most of the good dramatic negatives made in Europe by Societies of Actors and Directors.

The True Feature Company deals only in modern, emotional and original dramas in films averaging a little higher than three reels. They have a large stock of such features now on hand, most of them ready for buyers or renters. Highly artistic and effective paper goes with the pictures. They announce as their first release a four-reel drama of exceptional power and merit, entitled "The Doom of Darkness." It is a story of true tragic significence, but without the portrayal of any crime or any morbid sensationalism. Mr. F. Burkart, former director of the Irving Place Theater, plays the lead. Other dramas to follow deal with thrilling plots and events taken from the world of higher sports, such as automobiles, aeroplanes, etc.

Affiliated with the True Feature Company is the Vero Society, which has at its disposal a large and wholly original library of educational pictures. All of these educational pictures were printed from recent negatives made by order and special direction of the Vero Society. Catalogues of both dramatic and educational subjects will be sent postpaid to any address upon application.

EXCLUSIVE MAKES IMPORTANT ALLIANCE.

The Exclusive Supply Corporation authorizes the announcement that it has formed an important alliance with the London agencies—the Tyler Film Company, Gerard Film Company, Tyler Apparatus Company, Globe Film Company and American Film Releases. The companies named have recently combined in one company, handling the entire feature output for the English-speaking world of fourteen different English, German, French, Italian, Scandinavian, Austrian and Spanish manufacturing concerns.

Under the arrangement effected for handling these features in this market, the head offices in London will select from the output weekly three features considered to be the best for release on the American market and from these three releases upon their arrival here will be selected for weekly distribution the one best feature. This process of selection assures for this market one unusually good feature every week.

This feature will be released on the Exclusive program and handled in America under the brand name of Film Releases of America.

LEASES THEATER.

H. DeMotte Perry, of Bellows Falls, Vt., has leased the Grand theater of that city. It is a modern structure and has a seating capacity of about 850 persons. Mr. Perry expects to open on Labor Day. The policy of the house has not yet been decided upon.

At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs.

By George Blaisdell.

IN a recent interview, Augustus Thomas, who is known to the American public not only as a great playwright, but also as a public man, had some things to say about the motion picture industry. Mr. Thomas is to be the chief director of the All Star Feature Corporation, the first production of which will be "Arizona." What the famous playwright had to say got under the skin of a well-known director with whom the writer was talking on Monday. This man, by the way, has been in the picture game from the beginning, and before that he had had experience behind footlights. One thing in particular was uppermost in the mind of the old-time picture man. Mr. Thomas, while declaring that he did not intend to say anything which might be construed as meaning that all producers of motion pictures who had preceded him had been careless and inefficient, said that he had seen some motion pictures since he had been studying them which have not been correctly produced.

"Mr. Thomas admits," said the director, "that he has been studying motion pictures only a few months. Perhaps after he has been actually producing pictures for even that short time he will be more chary of referring to the mistakes of picture makers. There are among us many who try to avoid mistakes. Mr. Thomas says that he feels the best policy is to make the pictures absolutely correct. That is a splendid ideal. Mr. Thomas' experience has been of the stage. Now we all know it is customary in the case of a new stage production, after it has been rehearsed, to take the company down to Atlantic City or over into Connecticut and, as the saying is, 'try it on the dog.' Everybody who has had experience with new productions knows what happens following each of these initial presentations—the trimming and the pruning and the altering generally. I have seen productions which on the sixth run would have been unrecognizable to one who had seen the first. Mr. Thomas overlooks the one great factor that in picture making always stares a director in the face: When your film is released it is beyond recall. You have got to stand on it. You can change, correct, eliminate or insert nothing.

"Take, for an illustration, what Mr. Thomas describes as the simple matter of soldiers' uniforms. Conceding that some directors are careless in the matter, there are many of us who really try to be right. I do. For one thing, I have had a half dozen years' experience in military matters. The real difficulty comes in getting accurate data on foreign uniforms. A short time ago when we had a question here, I sent for an officer of a European army, on detail in this city. In conference with a former soldier of the same nation the two were unable to agree on the details of some of the simpler uniforms at present in use in that country.

"Mr. Thomas is right when he says that more time must be taken in the making of pictures. He is right again when he says that you cannot tell a director that he must have a picture filmed by next Tuesday and expect him to be careful. Mr. Thomas is entering the picture field at a time when his announced policy of no attention to expense will have a chance to succeed. He will get the benefit of the changes which the American market is at present undergoing. Heretofore the expenditure of large sums in the making of pictures has been practically a business impossibility. I am speaking particularly of the independent side of the house, although conditions in the licensed field were much the same. If a company issuing through the Universal, or the Mutual, should have a product that stood well above the average of the companies competing with it, the sales might have amounted to two or three prints in excess of the others; not much more. The buying market was restricted; it was arbitrary, inelastic. Matters filmwise are brightening these days. We'll soon see, unless I am much mistaken, good licensed pictures being shown in independent houses as we are now seeing good independent pictures in licensed houses.

"Mr. Thomas will be welcomed by all manufacturers who desire to see the industry get ahead. He is the sort of man we like with us. No doubt he will teach us something; we'll hope so, anyway. I believe, however, when he has seen several of his pictures on the screen he will be ready to admit that he has yet to learn about the art of kinematography much that others have spent years of hard work in acquiring."

Marc MacDermott and Miss Miriam Nesbitt, the well-known Edison players who this summer are making pictures in England, recently were introduced to the audience of a London picture theater. Their appearance followed the showing of the fine Edison film, "The Gauntlets of Washington," in which Mr. MacDermott was featured. The Edison player made a short talk, in which he stated that though America could produce better films than England, the latter had a good lead in its picture playhouses. The two visitors were given a most hearty greeting by a large audience.

Mrs. Phillips Smalley, known to picture followers as Miss Lois Weber, recently addressed the Woman's City Club of Los Angeles at their monthly luncheon. It may not be generally known that Mrs. Smalley, before going into pictures, was for two years a church missionary. It must have been her experiences in this field that gave her the insight into character which is so markedly in evidence in the scripts that come from her pen. So in addressing the women of the club she brought to her address a vision sharpened in unusual ways—she had seen in the life the things she portrays on the screen. "During two years of church army work I had ample opportunity to regret the limited field any individual worker could embrace even by a life of strenuous endeavor," said the Rex star to her audience. "Meeting with many in that field who spoke strange tongues, I came suddenly to realize the blessing of a voiceless language to them. To carry out the idea of missionary pictures was difficult. To raise the standard was a different matter, but the better class of producers were prompt in trying to do this when they were brought to a realization of defects by censorship. It took years to interest the best actors and to bring back refined audiences, but even this has been accomplished. We need thoughtful men and women to send us real criticisms and serious communications regarding our efforts."

The Mutual quarters on the fourteenth floor of the Masonic Temple Building, 71 West Twenty-third Street, are spacious and light. On the one floor are the general offices, the Mutual exchange, an extensive poster department and a large projection room. The various forces are about settled.

Operators running two projection machines should carefully avoid cutting short the last scene on a reel in order to slam on the succeeding picture. This holds particularly true in the cases of multiple reel films. If it is a two-part picture, the concluding scene on the first reel is almost invariably an important one, and should be shown to the last inch without interruption. The writer recalls an incident where an employee of a large Broadway house, which at the time referred to had an audience of a thousand persons, ruined the final scene of an impressive Biograph picture by prematurely lowering in front of the screen a baseball bulletin.

George Balsdon, the chief of the poster department of the General Film Company, with his wife and daughter, is spending a couple of weeks at Moosehead Lake, Me. Mr. Balsdon is putting in much time with a fishing rod. Before he returns to New York he will have laid the groundwork for a poster branch in Bangor. During Mr. Balsdon's absence W. P. Allen, his aid, is in charge of the ship.

Ye film followers who love a great picture—straight drama; good story; fine settings; craftsmanlike direction; natural acting—give yourself a treat and seek out Vitagraph's two-reel special of July 26, "A Prince of Evil." You will see Rogers Lytton at his best—that means much; and likewise Harry Northrup and Edith Storey and E. K. Lincoln. There is one other—Anita Stewart. It is seldom that there falls to a screen player such an opportunity as she has in the climax of this story. It is far rarer that a screen player rises to an opportunity as Miss Stewart does here. She places herself in the front rank of picture actresses—and that is no equivocal statement in these days. It is difficult, though, to praise one of the players in this picture without experiencing a fear of being unfair to the others—the work of all is so uniformly high. This includes Anders Randolph, who played the detective. The little that fell to him was splendidly, naturally done. The author of the script was Marguerite Bertsch. Ralph Ince was the director. More power to him. It speaks well for the Vitagraph organization that a picture of this quality can be issued unheralded, with no explosion of superlatives.

TRYING TO GET TOGETHER.

New York Exhibitors Consider Plans for Reorganization.

A meeting of New York motion picture exhibitors was held at the Union Square Hotel on Monday, July 28, at 11 o'clock, for the ostensible purpose of forming a new organization in New York City. By some chance members of the bolting organization were called by President Samuel H. Trigger to attend this meeting, and when they appeared a general invitation was extended to them to take part in the discussion. After considerable forensic exercise it was decided to appoint an arbitration committee, to frame a resolution looking toward the establishment of harmony among the exhibitors of Greater New York. After due deliberation the committee reported the following resolutions:

"First—That we reorganize under the name of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York.

"Second—That we do not affiliate with any national or international body or movement for a period of one year, and at the expiration of that time a two-thirds vote shall be required for us to become represented in any national or international body.

"Third—That the present board of officers be asked to resign and that the members thereof shall not be eligible for election to any office for a period of one year.

"Fourth—That our by-laws shall be so amended to read that no officer shall hold his or the same office for more than one year in succession."

When the committee made its report to the assembled exhibitors there was a wide difference of opinion as to just what was meant by the terms thereof, and an extended discussion took place. It was finally decided that the members of the bolting organization headed by President Trigger should hold a meeting on the following Friday, August 1, to consider the resolutions proposed, and that until that time the sponsors for the new organization should take no further steps toward forming a new association.

The members of the new movement headed by Sidney Ascher and R. L. MacNab, first vice-president of the National League, appointed a committee consisting of Ed Valensi, L. Germain, J. Jayleigh Wolf and John J. Mullaney, these four to choose the fifth member, which will act as a nominating committee to select officers of the Motion Picture Exhibitors of Greater New York under the terms of the resolutions quoted above in case those resolutions are adopted by the members of the bolting organization.

PROGRAM FOR FAMOUS PLAYERS.

The most important film news of the week comes in the form of an announcement from the Famous Players' Film Company to the effect that, beginning September 1, it will inaugurate a policy of regular releases of three, four or five reel features. These productions will be issued three times a month, their length to be determined by the particular requirements of each subject. This monthly program will be as pretentious as the former releases of this company, and will conform with the standard established and maintained by the Famous Players' Film Company. This policy was formulated as a direct effect of the demand for more frequent releases of the Famous Players' product. It is an acknowledgment of the wide and general indorsement of the Famous Players' activities and also an answer to the repeated requests of exhibitors and State right buyers throughout the country.

For several months past the Famous Players' Film Company has been planning to increase the volume of its output, but withheld making premature announcements of its purpose until all necessary preparations were completed. Quietly but constantly it has been at work gathering a promising number of prominent stars, famous plays and popular novels, until now it has developed an organization including a most brilliant array of stars and a most impressive array of subjects.

The first productions to be released in the new program will be, in their order, Mrs. Fiske in her well-known play, "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," Mary Pickford in "In a Bishop's Carriage," Henry E. Dixey in "Chelsea 7750," Lillie Langtry in "His Neighbor's Wife," and Laura Sawyer, the film favorite, in "An Hour Before Dawn," a female detective story.

SOLAX ENGAGES LEVERING.

Joseph Levering is a recent addition to the Solax Stock Company. Mr. Levering is a well-known leading man and has had many important engagements with prominent stock companies and Broadway productions.

NEW GREAT NORTHERN FAVORITE.

One of the latest acquisitions to the acting staff of the Great Northern players is Betty Nansen, who has won distinction in the dramatic profession during her connection with the stage in many of the European capitals. She has played many roles and was induced to enter the moving picture realm only after its wonderful possibilities were made quite clear to her by the Great Northern directorate. Miss Nansen, as may be judged from the accompanying portrait, is winsome and attractive, and during her connection with the Great Northern Company she has experienced little difficulty in demonstrating that her stage training has been responsible for making her one of the most talented and popular actresses appearing in moving picture productions.

Betty Nansen.

EDISON NOTES.

Edison announces "Dolly Varden" for release in the near future. As an extract from "Barnaby Rudge" this film is sure to be of interest.

* * *

"The Treasure of Captain Kidd," a story based upon the life of the famous buccaneer, is shortly to be released by Edison. It is the first of a series of stories dealing with famous treasures.

Gladys Hulette, whose performance of Beth in "Little Women" will never be forgotten by lovers of the artistic, has returned to the Edison studio and is soon to appear in some prominent roles.

Laura Sawyer, the popular Edison leading woman, has been honored by election to the motion picture chapter of Mu Gamma, a well-known college sorority. As only a very few of the well-known stars have been chosen by the society, Miss Sawyer's election is a fitting commentary upon her immense popularity.

GERTRUDE COGHLAN JOINS SELIG.

Miss Gertrude Coghlan, the actress, will become a regular member of the Selig organization this month. She will for the present be located at the Chicago studios of the company, and will make her first picture appearance in a series of plays specially written to suit her personality. Miss Coghlan is known for her beauty and emotional ability, and should prove one of the strongest drawing cards in the motion picture world.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"RESCUING DAVE" (Essanay).

In selecting comedy-dramas, one must be very, very careful not to select one in which the climacteric events are too numerous and startling. In "Rescuing Dave" the exhibitor is given a splendid performance of comedy situations, with enough serious matter to make the production very interesting. Synopsis:

Ruth Page becomes infatuated with the new boarder from the city. Dave Cobb, her rural sweetheart, asks her to go with him and his father to locate a new well. Billy Graham, the new boarder, laughs at Ruth, and she refuses to go. Dave becomes downhearted, and leaving the well decides to go fishing. While he is gone the well caves in. (The comedy situations are unique and clever up to this point. From here on the exhibitor is shown what a comedy company can do in the dramatic line.) Ruth, conscious-stricken at the way she has treated Dave, searches for him, to beg his forgiveness. She becomes hysterical when she discovers that the well has caved in. Thinking her Dave had been killed, she cries for help. Can you imagine the utter enjoyment of Ruth when she discovers that her sweetheart had not been killed, but is standing before her asking her what all the excitement is about? So with these climacteric events and splendid comedy situations it makes this reel a splendid headline attraction. On the same reel with "Rescuing Dave" is another excellent comedy, entitled "Mr. Ryhe Reforms." Following is a short synopsis: Mr. Ryhe, of very intemperate habits, is visited by a fireman friend, who tries to persuade him to stop drinking. Mr. Ryhe becomes angry and refuses to listen to him. After the fireman leaves, Ryhe goes to the fire barn after him. The fireman seats him on a bench and he falls asleep, where he has a terrible dream. He is awakened by the fireman playing the hose on him. He swears "never again."

Scene from "Rescuing Dave" (Essanay).

FULLER GOES TO COAST.

"WHEN TONY PAWNED LOUISA" (Lubin).

This is one of Lubin's most enjoyable comedies. The idea of pawning a girl may appear to be very far-fetched and almost impossible, but the picture proves it all to be reasonable and an extremely pretty romance. The cast employs the best players of the Lubin stock and tells a story that is not only the acme of comedy, but has a nice dash of pathos.

When Tony Roig came to America, he had little money, but the gamblers at the club let him win for a while until he had $200 to the good. Tony then sent to Italy for his mother and Louisa, his sweetheart, and lodged them in a humble tenement. Tony's luck did not continue, he needed money, and did wrong. Among his friends he counted one Josef Vochman, a pawn broker, and he asked for a loan of $150. Vochman usually got collateral for security, but Tony had nothing to offer. Vochman knew that Louisa was pretty and he thought she would be useful in the shop. He would loan Tony the money, but for one week only and he would take Louisa as a pledge. The idea was terrible, but Tony was in a bad fix and, though Louisa and his mother protested, the girl was dragged to the pawn shop. Vochman counted out the money and turned Louisa over to his mother for safe keeping. Louisa was very useful in the shop and would look pop-eyed at the diamonds as she polished them for the show cases. The home was far more comfortable than the tenement and Louisa was kindly treated. Weeks passed, but Tony did not turn up to redeem his sweetheart. One night he came, he was loudly dressed and exposed much jewelry. He had landed a political job. He counted out the $150 and demanded his girl. Louisa and Josef smiled. Vochman reminded him that the loan was for one week only, he was too late, Louisa and Josef had been married that morning.

Scene from "When Tony Pawned Louisa" (Lubin).

RELIANCE PRODUCES PRISON REFORM PICTURE.

According to "The Fight for Right," written by the Prison Labor Reform Agitator, James Oppenheim, for the Reliance feature release of August 9th, the prisoners at Sing Sing are treated like millionaires compared with the treatment received by prisoners in other States, where he claims that prison contract labor not only makes conditions much worse for the convicts, but also gives the labor unions a legitimate ground for complaint.

"The Fight for Right," which was staged by Oscar C. Apfel, called for the obtaining of much inside information regarding conditions in different prisons, as well as the taking of actual scenes in and about a large penitentiary.

KLEINE-ECLIPSE RELEASE CALLS FOR REAL CIRCUS.

Often the wayfarer finds himself stranded in Paris and, if his business is suitable for picture purposes, finds a ready market with one of the Parisian picture companies to tide him over a period of financial depression. The Eclipse Company of Paris is particularly notable in this respect as it has already taken up and popularized Joe Hamman, an American cowboy who struck a bit of hard luck in Paris some years ago and applied for "any kind of work." Joe Hamman has since then produced many "Western" features for Eclipse.

Scene from "The Clown's Revenge" (Kleine-Eclipse).

The Kleine-Eclipse release for August 19 is entitled "The Clown's Revenge," and was made by the Eclipse Company with a circus that fell into straits in the big French capital. Every actor is a member of the circus and the Eclipse stock company had the novelty of watching "rank amateurs" turn out an extremely interesting and more than ordinarily well-acted, two-reel drama. The big tents, animals and costumes of the circus were used.

COLUMBINE FEATURE AROUSES INTEREST.

The Columbine Films Company, which has just released a four-reel feature subject, "Saved by the Juvenile Court," or "Fighting Crime," reports a great interest among State rights purchasers for this production. It is in receipt of a great number of letters from child betterment organizations with which Judge Ben B. Lindsey, who is featured in this film, is identified, expressing pleasure at having the work of Judge Lindsey introduced by means of the motion picture.

It is understood that Judge Lindsey may personally direct the making of some features in the very near future, dealing with the "Child Labor" question, following in a measure his articles on this subject now appearing regularly in one of the popular monthly magazines.

"MONEY'S MERCILESS MIGHT" (Gaumont).

A new departure for the Gaumont Company is announced for release on August 15 in "Money's Merciless Might," a drama of modern conditions in the America of today. This is a three-reel feature of more than ordinary interest, as it deals with the successful efforts of an American money-king to rid himself of unwelcome competitors in the race for the hand of the girl he has set his heart upon. Many of the scenes are of exciting tendencies, including an aeroplane tragedy, the smashing of a New York broker, and a duel to the death in the gray light of early morn. We believe this is one of the first Gaumont features dealing directly with America, the majority of this house's output being concerned with European characters and situations.

THE SUPREME HAS NEW FEATURES.

Jacob Berg and Abraham Bloom have recently returned from Europe with a few fine features in their bags. They secured the American agency for the "B. B." and "Apollo" films of Germany and brought some twenty-one negatives as well. These will soon be offered to State right buyers.

MISS CARMEN MARYON,

Who is now playing with Crystal Film Company. She has played for several years in Mexico and South American theaters and made a specialty of male characters. This dainty little comedienne is of the unmistakably dark-eyed, Spanish type of beauty that one associates with the senoritas of Castile.

A MIDSUMMER ADVERTISING STUNT.

Always to the fore with advertising novelties for motion picture theaters, the Exhibitors' Advertising & Specialty Company, Arthur D. Jacobs, president and general manager, 30 Union Square, New York, has recently gotten out what it terms "Photoplayer Fans," which for this time of the year there can certainly be no more useful or appropriate souvenir to give away to moving picture patrons during the months of July, August and September. The fans are printed on two sides; on one side the exhibitor is allowed to choose the picture of any one of the two hundred and fifty different photoplay artists, male or female, appearing in either General Film, Mutual or Universal films. On the other side of the fan is the advertisement of the theater giving them out as souvenirs. These fans are sold in 500 lots at $6.50, or 1,000 lots for $11.50, practically about one cent apiece, so any manager playing to either a five or ten cent admission can easily afford to give them away, keeping his audience cool and comfortable during the summer months, and as these fans are sure to be carried away by your patrons to their homes and seen by their friends and acquaintances, it means a lasting advertisement for the theater. All orders accompanied by the necessary remittance should be addressed to Dept. "W," care of the above concern, to receive prompt and careful attention.

GEORGE KLEINE TO RELEASE NEW BRAND OF FILM.

George Kleine announces that in the future another make of film will be released by him in America. This is the product of the Celio Company of Rome, Italy, a new corporation whose releases have never before been seen in America. Mr. Kleine was so impressed with what he saw of the new company before he left Europe that contracts were made to release the Celio Company's pictures regularly in this country.

"THE PIT AND THE PENDULUM."

Three-Reel Solax Feature.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

This terrifying but thrilling story of Edgar Allan Poe has been made into moving pictures by the Solax Company. The film follows the tale of the poet with laudable faithfulness. As the tale itself is really nothing more than a succession of horrors, it was necessary to add a plot and this has been done with considerable skill. Poe undoubtedly appeals to a widespread taste for the classically gruesome and there is no doubt that this taste will be gratified by these pictures.

Scene from "The Pit and the Pendulum" (Solax).

The tortures of the Inquisition are shown with no mean degree of realism and we also get a glimpse of history in seeing the French army abolish the Inquisition at Toledo.

The actor who takes the part of the villain in the play shows great ability though the part is by no means a thankful one. If he is given the right opportunity he may develop into a star, he has the gift of expressing himself before the camera. The task of Darwin Karr was the most exacting of all. He was sincere enough in his intentions, but the part seemed scarcely suited to him in all its severe requirements. To portray the emotions evoked by mental and physical tortures is one of a terrible test and few come out of it with complete success.

IMPROVING ITS PROJECTION.

Messrs. Nelson & O'Heron, of the Bentley Grand Opera House, Milbank, S. Dak., have just ordered from J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," a Hallberg 60 Amp. A. C. to D. C. Economizer. Mr. Hallberg reports among other sales during the past week, one Powers No. 6A complete with Hallberg A. C. Economizer to Groberg & Stern, Meserole Airdome, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Powers No. 6A complete with Hallberg A. C. Economizer and full line of supplies to the Manhattan Theater, 1059 Manhattan Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y. Messrs. Keller & Sapphire, have ordered for their new theater at 181st and Audubon Avenue, New York, two Powers No. 6A with motor drives and two Hallberg A. C. Economizers.

TWO PRECISION EXHIBITS.

BENNETT BUILDING EXPENSIVE PICTURE HOUSE.

J. R. Bennett, owner of the Victoria theater, a moving picture house in Piqua, Ohio, is building a $20,000 picture theater in Piqua. The house will be modern in every respect and thoroughly fireproof. Its dimensions are 39 feet by 91 feet and it will have exits on all sides. Together the parquette floor and the balcony will accommodate 600 persons. Among the many conveniences that will be installed is a drinking fountain. Mr. Bennett expects to have the theater open by September 8. Piqua has a population of 15,000.

"MATING" (Imp).

The story relates to life in the primitive ages when might was right, when romance played very little part in the mating of man and woman. "Pretty One" had ripened to blushing girlhood, and as she saw the simple smile of youth fade into the beauties of womanhood, she felt enraptured.

"Little Man," who had become bewitched by the charms of "Pretty One," wooed her and brought her gifts of game and skins. She accepted his pleasantries and his gifts, but coquettishly refused to become his mate. "Great One" had often admired "Pretty One," and as he saw "Little Man" and "Pretty One" in the woodland, he rushes upon them and ruthlessly tosses "Little Man" aside, who slinks away muttering threats of dire vengeance, yet realizing that he cannot match his strength against "Great One."

Scene from "Mating" (Imp).

The scene changes to modern times and the three personalities present themselves in the form of a woman tremendously impressed by the strength and brawn of a common sewer digger, and loved by a man of culture and wealth. The laborer uses the primitive methods of "Great One" and so strongly impresses the woman with his strength that he almost wins her.

But might no longer is right, and the modern woman, asserting her right to mate with whom she pleases, accepts the "Little Man," leaving the "Great One" to ponder at the great change in social conditions of the world since the primitive period.

FLORENCE ROBERTS IN "SAPHO."

Assisted by Shelly Hull and some other Broadway players, Florence Roberts is putting on her nation-known version of "Sapho" for the camera. The particular camera happens to be New Majestic's. The management of that plant told Miss Roberts that it would be an injustice not to let posterity have her "Sapho."

The newly added stage at the Majestic Los Angeles studio on Brooklyn Heights came in handy when Miss Roberts' production was decided on. With the added stages, "sets" of greater dimension than had ever been seen in Majestic releases before will show in some of the "Sapho" scenes. Special scenic and property departments were created for the production of the feature. The report is that Miss Roberts will receive a royalty on the sale of the film, preferring this way of settlement as against a flat sum for her work and the use of her name. No one at the Brooklyn Heights studio knows exactly how many reels will be taken and released, but around five is the general guess. The cost of production is another vague thing, but it is certain that the figure runs pretty well into the thousands.

"A SHOT IN THE DARK" (Great Northern).

This, a dramatic offering, has an appealing touch, and in it are seen Miss Thomsen and Mr. Psilander in roles which are entirely suited to their personalities. And in order that the honors may be fairly divided, "Little Sunbeam" Frederickson, of the Great Northern staff, has been assigned to an important part and plays it with her accustomed chic and intelligence. According to the story depicted on the screen, Johnson, a young solicitor, meets a former sweetheart during the absence of his wife and baby girl on a vacation trip. Upon the return of the latter, Eva, the wife, grows suspicious because of her husband's conduct and gains from him a confession of his wrongdoing. Eva leaves him and with Jane, an old servant, and little Dorothy makes her abode elsewhere.

Scene from "A Shot in the Dark". (Great Northern).

The child is overtaken by illness and old Jane hastens to the father to notify him. It is agreed between them that he shall make a secret visit to his former home at 11 o'clock at night. While kneeling at the bedside of his baby, the mother is aroused and hearing a sound in the sick room, supposes that a burglar has entered the house. The shot that she fires in the dark at the intruder results in a superficial wound and is the means of bringing about a reconciliation. The play is well acted and is a most interesting offering.

A thrilling combat in which the U. S. Battleship "Utah" and war hydroplane destroy a foreign fort.

New York Press Report

MORNING TELEGRAPH

"VICTORY," SHOWN TO
U. S. DEPARTMENT HEADS, IS HIGHLY PRAISED

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 17.

Before an audience composed of heads of government departments, army and navy officers and members of both Houses of Congress, a private showing was held of the five-part motion picture, "Victory," made by the Victory Film Company, of New York, with the recognition and aid of the United States army and navy. The exhibition has held at the Belasco Theatre, with about 800 persons present.

J. Parker Read of New York, arrived several days ago with the film. While arranging for the private exhibition he got Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, to appear in the opening scene, in which the command is given to a United States warship to proceed to foreign waters.

The picture proved a great success and was liberally applauded. After seeing it, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, acting for Secretary Daniels, who had then left Washington on a trip to last several days, gave Mr. Read the following endorsement of the picture:

"The officials of the Navy Department had the pleasure yesterday of witnessing a private exhibition of your naval drama in motion pictures, entitled 'Victory.'

"We are pleased to state that your scenario, depicting war with its naval and land battles, is carried out in a very realistic manner and is authentic in details of ships and men and should be the cause of further interesting the public in the United States Navy as it is in peace and as it might act in time of war.

"Very respectfully,
"Franklin D. Roosevelt,
"Acting Secretary of the Navy."

WASHINGTON TIMES

NAVAL OFFICIALS IN NEW "MOVIES" FILM

U. S. Aeroplane and Warships Are Shown In Thriller Given to Private Audience.

Army and navy officers, Government officials, and members of Congress know to-day why the "movies" craze is upon the great American public. They saw for themselves in a private exhibition at the Belasco Theatre, a real thriller of love, intrigue, and warfare in five reels. Victory was the name of this sensational drama, staged with American warships and war equipment through the aid of the Navy Department.

The cast includes Secretary Daniels, Admiral Badger, Com. Benson, Com. Bassett, Lieut. Comm. Butler, Flag Lieutenant McCandlass, Captain Bryant, Commander Doyle, and Lieut. John H. Towers, the naval aviator, nearly killed in an accident recently.

Part of the five reel thriller is a blood curdling plot to blow up the American fleet in a Cuban harbor. Then there is a woman in the case who detects the plot and tells it to the navy aviator. And then what do you think? With true patriotic spirit, the naval aviator does a 100 mile flight, reaching the fleet just in time to save it from the terrific mine explosion. Of course, he wins the hand of the heroic Helen, who tipped off the plot.

A PRODUCTION WHICH NECESSITATED AN INITIAL EXPENDITURE OF $42,000, ASIDE FROM HUNDREDS OF THRILLING SPECTACLES MADE POSSIBLE WITH THE AID OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY, WHICH A MILLION DOLLARS COULD NOT HAVE PURCHASED; THOUSANDS OF MEN IN REALISTIC FORT, NAVAL, AND LAND BATTLES, USING WAR HYDROPLANES, BATTLESHIPS, GUN BOATS, MONITORS, DESTROYERS, EXPLODING HARBOR MINES, HUNDREDS OF CANNONS, AND TONS OF POWDER.

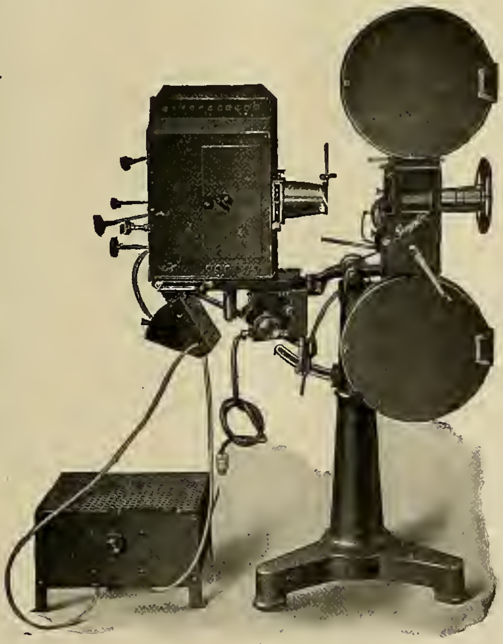
STERLING and SIMPLEX

The word "STERLING" marked on a piece of silverware, carries with it the idea of quality. All it really means is that the silver of which the article is made is of the finest.

Did you ever stop to consider that the design or the workmanship might be crude?

In this event the word "STERLING" while guaranteeing the quality of the material would not furnish much protection as to the true value of the article.

"STERLING" then is but a guarantee of material.



The word "SIMPLEX" marked on a projector means far more than a guarantee of the materials from which it is made.

It means, first, that the PROJECTOR is mechanically accurate—that in the course of manufacture it is graduated by the most perfect methods to 1/10,000 of an inch.

It means that the SIMPLEX projector was designed by the PRECISION MACHINE CO. to fill some definite, important task—that of projecting a perfect picture, and in the opinion of the trade all over the world that object has been achieved.

The word SIMPLEX on a projector is accepted the world over as a guarantee, not only of perfect projection, but also excellence of materials and mechanical perfection.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEW ORLEANS.

THE Jefferson Theater, operated by Andy Gugel and located in Gretna, the hustling suburb of New Orleans west-side,—and far famed as a harbor of safety for voyagers embarking on the matrimonial sea—was the scene of an interesting event recently when Roller Clayton and Miss Louisa Ruth, principal leads of the Ellsworth-Clayton Stock Co., were married in full view of the audience, Judge A. M. Dannauhauer, officiating. Mr. Gugel, who is president of the Louisiana Exhibitors' League, was host at a dinner following the ceremony, after which the newlyweds were deluged with rice packets, discarded foot-wear, etc. They will summer in New Orleans at the Bourbon.

Following an illness of short duration, said to be caused by infection from treatment by a local physician, which latterly developed into lock-jaw, Jules Bistes, resident manager of the Orpheum, died last Sunday morning. Mr. Bistes was probably the most widely known authority on motion picture apparatus in this section of the country. He supervised the erection and opening of the Orpheum in Salt Lake City from where he was transferred to New Orleans. Mr. Bistes was a member of the Shriners, Rotary Club, National Association of Theatrical Managers, Sons of Jove. Delegations from these associations attended the obsequies and attested their esteem to the man who was universally beloved on the local Rialto for his personal and business traits in directing the management of the Orpheum. Mr. Bistes was born in New Orleans.

Jos. Nicolosi has opened the Lubin in Ninth near Magazine Street, with a seating capacity of 500. A ten-piece orchestra and spot singers, together with a four-reel program, round out a pleasant evening of entertainment.

Incidental to its formal organization the local circle of The Inquest Club held its first meeting recently, after which they visited Pearce's Tudor Theater and viewed Eliza G. Harral's comedy, "Solitaires," produced by the Vitagraph Company. Miss Harral was in the audience—an interested spectator. Julian Lamothe and Myra Hamilton are developing the nucleus for the circle which promises to gather the membership desired. The organization banquet will take place during the first week in August.

The Coliseum opened recently at Camp and Thalia Streets, presents a natty exterior and the management reports good business. Entertaining programs and good music bid for favor in that vicinity.

The Lafayette, one of the largest exclusive motion picture theaters in the United States, continues to draw crowded houses. Abe Seligman, the manager, expects to make many innovations in the near future.

Realizing the advantages afforded by moving pictures, Pulitzer and Stier, publishers of Pearce's Weekly Bulletin, have taken over the management of that publication and in addition will engage in the business of motion picture publicity in all its branches, Mr. Pulitzer managing the advertising department. Mr. Stier, who will direct its editorial and news policy, is one of the best publicity experts in the South. He was chief director of publicity for the Panama Exposition Company and edited the Logical Point Magazine which gained international favor as the publication which developed public sentiment for New Orleans as the place for the fair, and helped its recognition before Congress. He handled the Shriners' press bureau during their convention in 1910, and is at present press representative for Jerusalem Temple of this city. Eighteen years of active experience as a member of "the fourth estate" befits him and Pulitzer to make a winning combination.

Fire recently at Independence, La., which nearly devastated the entire town, causing a loss of a quarter million dollars, also wiped out the chief places of amusements—two moving picture theaters. One enterprising manager wired an exchange in New Orleans to ship a new machine and films, and forty-eight hours afterwards was about to open under canvas, when he was compelled to abandon this idea, due to the complete destruction of the town's electric light plant.

MAURICE F. BARR.

PHILADELPHIA.

IT is doubtful whether the old Walnut Street Theatre will be opened to the public again, owing to the Chief Executive of the city refusing to grant a license to the lessee, Mr. Louis B. Mayer, because the theater has not been made to conform to the new standards of the Bureau of Building Inspection. The management of the house claim that the building has ample exits, and that the arrangements for handling the audience in the case of fire or panic had received the approval of the fire marshal last fall and winter, and they further declare that the Walnut Street Theater as compared with other places of amusement was as safe as could be made.

The Savoy Theater, 1211 Market street, will be one of the most imposing places of its kind on that street, when the alterations of the front now under way are completed. The interior will be redecorated and a new lighting system installed, while the exterior will be repainted and a marble lobby of unique design will be built. The total cost of alterations will be in excess of $3,500.

F. William Kamp, of the Calehuff Supply Company, has returned from a three weeks' vacation to Ocean City, N. J.

Thomas Dougherty is having plans made for a one-story picture theater to be erected at the corner of Fifteenth and Arch Streets. The building will be 21 feet by 100 feet, fireproof.

Charters were recently issued to the Red Lion Opera House Company, Red Lion, Pa., with a capital of $10,000, and the Third Street Theater Company of Easton, Pa., with a capital of $6,000, by the Governor of Pennsylvania.

A. E. Westover is about to build a theater at Second and Noble Streets with a seating capacity of 500, which will be completed in the early fall. The materials will be brick, bluestone, ornamental terra cotta and stucco.

The Arch Street Amusement Company is the name of a concern which will erect a new theater at 1334-36 Arch Street. Local contracting firms are estimating on the plans and the theater is to be finished by the first of the year.

A contract has been awarded by J. J. Goodsteine, for the erection of a theater at 2011-13 Frankford Avenue, which will cost $5,200.

"Quo Vadis?" which has made a big hit with the motion picture fans of this city at the Garick Theatre for the past six weeks, is now being played in some of the straight picture houses. Recently the Victoria Theater featured the film to crowded houses.

Peter G. Atsalas, owner of the Orpheum Theater, at Youngstown, Ohio, was a recent visitor in Philadelphia, looking after some big features for his theater. He claims that the censorship law in Ohio makes it impossible for exhibitors to get any kind of high class features, and that most of them must send to other cities out of that state for their supply.

Edward Kraupa, of the Monarch Film Exchange, has added a feature end to his regular service. Recently he bought the rights to handle the feature productions of eight foreign houses in the United States, and of the plays so far received he has had great success in booking them with the local houses, and inquiries are coming in from all parts of the country in regard to the new features. In order to handle the new phase of the business Mr. Kraupa may discontinue the regular service.

The Airdome, located at Seventh and Poplar Streets, is meeting with great success under the management of S. Jarrow.

A few days ago the Belgrade Theater, located at Belgrade Avenue and Thompson Street, closed its dors, owing to the fact that the proprietors of the place were unable to meet the claims of their many creditors.

The Woodbury Amusement Company is remodeling its theater at Woodbury, N. J. The seating capacity is being made greater in order to accommodate the summer crowds that throng the resort.

Director Porter, of the Department of Public Safety, has issued an order to every police lieutenant in Philadelphia that hereafter it will be part of their duties to visit all picture theaters in the city and personally talk to the owners in regard to the elimination of objectionable pictures and also to censor the banners that are placed in front of the amusement houses. The Director has a plan whereby he believes he can stop what he terms "motion picture flirtations." Managers will be requested to seat unaccompanied young ladies in one part of the house, while unaccompanied young men are placed in another. A third section the Director requested be reserved for couples. The exhibitors are working in co-operation with the police.

CONGDON.

ILLINOIS.

MOVING pictures are being used at a revival meeting being held by the East End Christian Church in Quincy. They are said to have proved very effective in attracting non-churchgoers to the services.

Manager Burr Swan, of the Knights of Pythias Opera House, at Pittsfield, showed the people of that small but enterprising city that the motion picture is indispensable for all kinds of social service. A mass meeting was held when Miss Harriet Fulmer, of Chicago, made an address upon the prevention of tuberculosis. The enterprising Swan imported six reels that showed the work done by the various anti-tuberculosis organizations throughout the country.

The Carlyle Amusement Company, of Carlyle, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $500. The incorporators are Millicent Kahlert, George E. Murray and Hugh V. Murray.

Piek & Penn, who operated a moving picture show and airdome at Waterloo, have removed to Columbia.

The village trustees of Raritan have decided to make the photoplay a municipal institution. The opera house in that village has never been paid for and with the debt over their heads, the trustees have tried various means to reduce it. Finally they hit upon moving pictures.

The Kenmore Amusement Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with a capital stoke of $2,500. The incorporators are Richard S. Fulsom, A. E. Iceley, and Wallace Streeter.

The Walker Opera House at Champaign has inaugurated a short season of moving pictures. Multiple reel features will play an important part. A ten-cent admission will be secured.

C. J. Roberts, of Springfield, deputy state fire marshal, recently inspected the Colonial and Virginian theaters at Hoopeston and found them to be in good condition.

W. B. Finn, manager of the Tureman at Virginia, secured the contract from the merchants of that city to furnish a free open air moving picture show on the courthouse square each Tuesday evening. This arrangement will be found more satisfactory than to secure another operator and machine in opposition to the local picture show.

Moving pictures of a big celebration held by Red Men at Danville, and Westville, were recently taken and shown at the Majestic. Coal mines and other industries in the vicinity completed the reel.

Merchants of Odell contemplate giving free open air picture shows once each week.

The Pastime Theater Company, of East Moline, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $2,500. The incorporators are Edward Reavy, John L. Greer and T. J. Gorman.

The Circuit Court of Peoria County paved the way for a ninety-nine year lease to Robinson & Robinson, of the Crescent Theater, at 311 Main Street. The court has decided that the trustees are at liberty to correct the lease and the Robinsons will remodel the building putting a storeroom in front and a theater to seat 900 or 1,000 in the rear.

John N. Stanople, proprietor of the Princess Theater in North Fifth Street, in Quincy, and two confectioners in that city, have purchased a site on Maine Street, upon which they will erect a combination motion picture, vaudeville and road show house to cost about $65,000. It is planned to erect a three-story office building with a theater which will seat 650 persons on the main floor, 350 in the first balcony and 300 in the second balcony. Stanople has announced that the policy of motion pictures and vaudeville will probably rule the house. It is hoped to have it ready for occupancy some time in December.

Moving pictures of a class of communicants together with Bishop E. M. Dunne and the priests, and pictures of St. Hyacinth's school and church at LaSalle, proved a valuable attraction for the Family Theater at LaSalle.

The Commercial Club of Weldon has adopted the moving picture as an evening attraction to bring people to the city.

The Chelius Brothers Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $50,000 to do a theatrical and amusement business. The incorporators are William F. Chelius, John Chelius and J. Fred Sheehy.

The Wabash Railroad has substituted the moving pictures for the stereopticon in its instruction car, which is now busy in Central Illinois, showing trainmen how to use the locomotive and air brakes. The lecture car is maintained by the employees and not by the company, each engine man paying fifty cents a month toward its support.

Rev. James Potter, pastor of the Methodist Church at Rock Falls, recently preached a sermon upon the subject of moving pictures and resented the fact that the consent to operate on Sunday was secured while two aldermen were absent from the city. He declared that "those responsible" for the opening of the Sunday shows in Rock Falls are entitled to all the satisfaction they can get out of the manner in which it was brought about. It does not reflect great credit on their good judgment or their honor. It looks very much like "putting it over a town," and this is a thing that always reacts on the one who tries it. The town in this case gets not one cent more revenue in return for the concession granted. It is simply a play into the hands of a greed that thrives on a disregard for sacred institutions and the public welfare.

"This process will not stop with the open show. Rock Falls will either be closed to these or open to a lot of other things as well. When a town is 'open,' the opening is downward. Make it hard for the church to do its work of moral uplift, and you sow the seeds of disaster in the city. The church wages a warfare on Sabbath desecration, but it is the community itself that the chief interest is the outcome. And he either knows little or cares less who is blind to this fact so often demonstrated."

The Sterling Standard says, "It is asserted that one pastor in Rock Falls has said that if Sunday picture shows are permitted in his city that there is going to be a church that will be minus a six-foot preacher, as he does not intend to stay in a town where pictures are permitted to be shown on the Lord's Day."

It is reported that Manager Rademacher, of the Orpheum, at Freeport, will add two or three acts of vaudeville to his picture show when he reopens his house in the fall.

Lutterell's theater at Jacksonville has done away with the vaudeville during the months of July and August, and has reduced the price to five cents for 4,000 feet of pictures.

LOUISVILLE.

ONE of the productions of "Quo Vadis?" already has been seen in Louisville, while another is scheduled to appear late in August. The production of three reels by the Quo Vadis Film Company was shown at the Orpheum Theater recently. The eight-reel subject by Kleine will be an attraction at Keith's Theater the last week of August. The first was a big drawing-card, and much interest attaches to the coming of the second.

The Princess Amusement Company, of Louisville, staged a novel plan recently by giving away twenty-five lots in the Sonona Valley in Southern California. Two of the lots were raffled off each night in each of the three houses operated by the Princess. This advertising plan was made possible through an arrangement with the Northwestern Development Company, which owns a big tract in Central California. The announcement by the Princess attracted much interest and served to attract big audiences.

The Switow Amusement Company, headed by M. Switow, has opened a moving picture theater at French Lick, Ind., and is erecting another at Martinsville, Ky., a well known health resort. The theater going up in New Albany, Ind., is well under way and will be completed in another month. Mr. Switow is suffering from rheumatism, and is spending his time at Martinsville, where the waters are causing improvement in his condition.

A. F. Mayer, head of the Louisville branch of the Central Film Service Company, of Indianapolis, will shortly leave for Chicago, according to present plans. Mr. Mayer has practically closed a deal whereby he will be connected with the John B. Simon Agency, of Chicago. That concern is one of the best known theatrical booking agencies handling theaters in and around the Windy City. It is now erecting a house of its own. Who will succeed Mr. Mayer in Louisville is not known.

Plans for a new $125,000 moving picture theater have been announced by the National Moving Picture Company, recently formed in Louisville. A long-term lease has been secured on Fourth Avenue property, south of Chestnut Street and work will begin as soon as the tenants of the present structures have vacated. At that time, the building now standing will be razed and the handsome new theater erected. The new house will be just south of B. F. Keith's Louisville theater. It will have a frontage of 90 feet on Fourth Street and extend back 200 feet. A rathskeller will be a feature of the basement. Furnishings and accoutrements will compare favorably with those used in any house of the kind in the country. The theater will bear the name of the New Empress. It is to have a seating capacity of 2,000. A balcony may be a feature, though this has not yet been determined. The New Empress will give Louisville three photoplay houses in Fourth Avenue, the main retail business street. Both the Majestic and Novelty, the other two, are doing well, and it is hoped that the new theater will be able to make a financial success.

Under the management of Reich & Riordan, the Palace Theater, Louisville, has re-opened for business. The house recently was purchased by the new owners from Simon Switow.

The Majestic Theater, of Jeffersonville, Ind., has closed for the summer, the intense heat causing Owner S. Shaefer to decide on this policy. The theater will reopen about September 1.

Everich & Lacompte have purchased the Jeffersonville, Ind., Airdrome from H. S. Morris. Mr. Morris has decided to put a moving picture show on the road, the quiet life in one place palling on him.

S. W. Linebaugh, of Russellville, Ky., has decided to abandon the amusement field for a time and has sold the Princess Theater to Hill & Perry. The Princess is a handsome little house, seating about 300 people. The new owners will continue to use Universal service.

Eugene Guill, who has attained quite a reputation as an exhibitor at Hopkinsville, Ky., has connected with the General Film Company, of Cincinnati. Mr. Guill has resigned the management of the Princess Theater, of Hopkinsville. His successor has not yet been determined.

The old opera house at Lawrenceburg, Ky., has been renamed, and will be known as the Pastime Theater in the future. Preston Grubbs is manager of the house, which has been renovated. Only evening performances will be given, pending the return of cooler weather.

Moving picture devotees in interior towns of Kentucky are getting their first glimpse of Edison's Kinetophone. The talking picture has been staged at Ashland, Lexington, and other Kentucky towns with varying success, and exhibitors are watching the situation closely. The silent pictures, however, are so popular that it is improbable that any exhibitor will attempt to operate with the Kinetophone alone. The talking pictures are used daily at Keith's Louisville house, which is the only one in Kentucky to give their patrons a steady diet of them.

The Melba Theater has re-opened at Harrodsburg, Ky., after being closed for several weeks for improvements. New opera chairs and a cooling system have been installed, giving patrons every comfort during the hot weather.

The Savoy Theater, of Princeton, Ky., has opened to the public, being the first to enter that town.

Renovations have been completed in the Princess Theater, of Madisonville, Ky., and the house is again open. Taliaferro and Spoehr are the owners of the theater, having purchased it from W. S. Hibbs. Numerous improvements have been made, including new seats, lighting facilities and program.

A new photoplay theater to cost $100,000, including the land, is to go up at the northeast corner of Fifteenth Street and Central Avenue, Cincinnati. Congressman Nichols Longworth, who has owned the property for several years, has disposed of it to a syndicate, which will remain in the background for a time. The same interests are said to be after another site in Cincinnati. The consideration involved in the property exchange was $40,000. The theater proper will cost about $60,000. The lot faces 100 feet on Central Avenue and is 156 feet in depth. All the buildings now standing are to be razed, and work will begin immediately on the erection of the theater. A 50-foot lobby will be a feature. Plans for the structure provide for a couple of storerooms. The playhouse is in the heart of the Jewish district, and Jewish photoplays will be staged, as far as possible.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

INDIANAPOLIS.

THERE is unusual activity in the erection of buildings to be occupied by motion picture theaters in the city. The motion picture theater business is growing better all the time in the city, and the trend is toward higher class buildings and equipment. This is especially true in the residence districts. Until very recently, motion picture houses in the residence districts have consisted usually of a remodeled store room. New fireproof buildings are being erected for them.

Charles Warren Fairbanks, former vice-president of the United States, is erecting a building at Illinois and Thirteenth streets, part of which will be occupied by a motion picture theater. It will be thoroughly fireproof and the building will cost $25,000. The theater will have a seating capacity of 800, making it the largest motion picture house in the residence district. It will be operated by the Hyde Park Amusement Company, which has just been organized and incorporated. Officers of the amusement company are: President, E. Linwood Hardy; vice-president, Alvin C. Ostermeyer; secretary-treasurer, Henry S. Davidson.

Edward G. Sourbier, who operates the Oriental Theater in South Meridian street, has let contracts for a new motion picture house, to be built at 154-158 North Illinois street, in the downtown business district. It will be a one-story structure of exceptionally artistic exterior, of terra cotta and tile. There will be seating arrangements for five hundred people. The building is to cost $5,000, and will be ready for occupancy about October 1.

A contract for a new motion picture theater, to be erected at 515 Indiana avenue, has been let by Mrs. Nancy A. Smothers. This will be in a district occupied largely by negroes. The building will be one story high, of brick construction, and will cost $3,500. The seating capacity will be 350.

Within a short time, Irvington, a college suburb in the eastern part of the city, will have its first motion picture theater. The Cottage Construction Company has acquired a site at East Washington street and Johnson avenue, and on this will be built a one-story brick motion picture theater, with a seating capacity of five hundred. When completed, the house will be operated by H. L. Whitehead. The building will be completed in ninety days.

Work has been started on a motion picture theater building at Noble street and Massachusetts avenue. It will be operated by the Liberty Amusement Company, which was recently organized. The building is to be one story high, 52 by 80 feet, with a seating capacity of 300. The building is to cost $5,500.

B. F. Keith has arranged to show, throughout his string of theaters, pictures of little Catherine Winters, who was kidnapped from her home at Newcastle, Ind., more than two months ago. Slides telling of the mysterious disappearance of the child will also be shown, together with a statement of the rewards that have been offered for her return.

Joseph Gavin is remodeling a building at Lincoln and East streets, at a cost of $1,500, and when the work is completed, will conduct a motion picture house. The building will have a seating capacity of about three hundred.

The Commercial Film Manufacturing Company, of this city, has increased its capitalization to $55,000.

CLARENCE L. CUMMINS.

CINCINNATI.

FROM the ranks of the Cincinnati newsboys to wealth and fame, via the moving picture route, is the story of the life of Louis Silverman, formerly of this city, and now of Winnipeg, Man., Canada. Silverman is visiting his folks and friends here, he being on his honeymoon. Silverman went to Winnipeg when the moving picture was in its climb in popularity. There he and his partner opened up the first moving picture theater in that city. Business developed so rapidly that Silverman had to engage a private secretary. Miss Elizabeth Lechtzier was the girl chosen for the position. Two years elapsed, during which the business friendship ripened into love and culminated in the wedding of boss and employee two weeks ago.

McMahon & Jackson, proprietors of the Cincinnati-Buckeye Film Exchange, have become the local representatives of the "Progressive Wheel of Burlesque," which will be presented at the Olympic Theater in Seventh street.

Cincinnati, just at present, is undergoing three campaigns, two of them in the interest of two opposing factions seeking a new city charter, and the other two with a view to retaining the present form of administration. The moving picture has come in for its share of the bargain. Herbert S. Bigelow, heading one of the movements, was speaking to a large crowd of factory employees one day recently, and a moving picture man reported the meeting in film. The men, by holding up their hands, unanimously pledged themselves to Bigelow's side. The picture shows the men making the pledge, and also shows the scramble for the literature.

A moving picture theater, costing $20,000, with a seating capacity of 500, will be erected in this city by M. Van Den Eyaden and others. The proposed building will have a store on the ground floor, adjoining the playhouse, and the upper floors will be taken up with modern apartments.

Moving picture show proprietors in this city are awaiting with much interest, a decision to be handed down in the case of Sam Lewis, who was recently arrested for failure to take out a license under the recent ordinance passed by city council, in which the theaters of this city were placed on the graduating scale. Lewis is fighting the case, and brought suit to test the new ordinance, by way of a writ of habeas corpus. The case will be heard before Judge Geoghegan some time this week.

The Old Miami and Erie Canal, which has come in for a good deal of publicity in view of the contemplated abandonment of that waterway for the construction of a mall, again breaks through the news columns, and this time a moving picture theater goes out as a result. The ousting proceedings come from city hall. The theater is located at Findlay street and the canal, in the heart of a thickly populated tenement district, and business at the house is always good. But the canal played another one of its pranks, and a break in the wall, just about where the theater building is located occurred. Building Commissioner Rapp, in a report to Safety Director Price, declared that the building, along with several adjoining it, are unsafe, the moving picture theater being in particular danger. The building commissioner requested that the playhouse be closed until necessary repairs have been made, and his orders will be carried out.

Despite the excessive heat, summer picture shows in this city continue to draw large crowds. Prominent among them are the B. F. Keiths, where summer vaudeville and pictures take immensely.

The scheme of the city in presenting to the public a show at the various parks and playgrounds, has again taken well this summer with the populace.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL.

THE Boulevard Airdome on South Fourth street has reduced its price of admission from ten cents to five cents. This house has, since its opening, frequently used signs on the front of the street cars, which attract considerable attention. It is understood that the street railway company is willing to donate this space to any attraction that is likely to create traffic. A. A. Dickinson, a popular singer with the First Regiment Band of the Illinois National Guard, which was encamped at Camp Lincoln, Springfield, recently, sang at the airdome.

E. C. Bostick, who has been in the revenue service in Springfield for a number of years, has secured a transfer to the Pekin revenue office, where he can look after his photoplay house in that city.

A garnishment suit was filed by the Illinois Traction System against L. P. Anderson, at Lincoln. Anderson, who was a former resident of Springfield, operated the Gem Theater in Lincoln, and moved to Jacksonville, where he opened a picture show, securing power from the traction company. The company sent a bill for $99.16 for power, and, learning that Anderson had a deposit of $30 in a Lincoln bank, filed suit to secure the amount.

The first of the twice-a-week Pathe Weekly appeared coincidentally at the Vaudette and the the Lyric theaters, but another curious coincidence one showed United States Senator Lawrence Y. Sherman and the other United States Senator James Hamilton Lewis, who are well known here and but a few months ago were engaged here in one of the most noted political deadlocks in the history of the state.

Rev. Frederick W. Buraham, pastor of the First Christian Church of this city, recently preached a sermon on what the modern church should include. He suggested a stereopticon, the player piano and a talking machine. Mr. Burnham is the minister who a short time ago played the Kalem "From the Manger to the Cross" to two congregations instead of preaching a sermon. Despite the announcement of the Vaudette Amusement Company that the road set of films of "From the Manger to the Cross" will be retired until cooler weather, many requests for bookings have been coming in from several of the larger cities.

THE DEVIL AND TOM WALKER (August 4).—Tom Walker, a miserly man, is much beaten and bullied by his amazonian wife, Dame Walker. The action of the piece takes place in New England, early in the eighteenth century, when the Puritans were still in power. Tom, having been well drubbed, slinks out of his house and goes fishing with Old Briggs. While they are safely anchored in mid-stream, the latter tells him that Captain Kidd, the pirate, buried his treasure in that neighborhood, which excites the cupidity of Tom. He deserts his companion and takes to the woods, camps near the charming spot, and is almost frightened out of his wits by the appearance of the devil, who warns him to be off. "Out of the frying-pan into the fire," he goes home and, after telling his wife, receives a good beating, and she takes shovel in hand and proceeds to investigate the treasure herself. He endeavors to persuade her from her rash undertaking, but she hands him one from her "terrible left" and proceeds alone to unearth the treasure trove. The devil orders her away, but she puts up a stubborn fight, which is her last, as she disappears in the trench of her own making in a puff of smoke. His satanic majesty, having taken care of the tartar, seeks the cream in Tom's soul, which he bargains for on the ground that he will have the pirate's treasure and a beautiful young wife to boot, if he will give up said soul. Tom having lost his chief exercise in life—beatings from his wife—is willing to risk another consort who is young and beautiful, whose dowry is untold wealth. He consents to the compact, and then the devil makes him do all sorts of mean tricks, until Tom, overcome by remorse, seeks out the minister and begs him to save him from the devil. That worthy gives him a Bible and tells him to always keep it on his person and he will be immuned. The devil, however, disguised, bribes his old friend, Briggs, to steal the Bible, so the devil gets his dues and poor Tom presumably goes to more suffering in the after-life.

A MANSION OF MISERY (August 5).—Wilbur Nort, an Annapolis cadet, saves lovely Marjorie Main, an heiress, from drowning at a fashionable resort. The fair one falls in love with her rescuer, but her ambitious parents emphatically disprove the match. Fast following the young officer's graduation, duty calls him to sea, and he hears nothing of his American sweetheart for four years. In the interim the Mains marry their daughter to Lorenzo, a Neapolitan prince, and the pair take up their abode in their ancestral palace, where the lively but lovely young American leads a very unhappy existence.

An American squadron puts in at Naples, and the Prince is on the committee to entertain the officers. Ignorant of the identity of the Princess, Wilbur, an officer of the fleet, attends the reception at the palace. When he meets Marjorie the recognition is intense and dramatic. Both are overcome by the old love, for Marjorie has been miserably unhappy since her social imprisonment in Italy. The pair stroll out into the garden, and there, in the shadow of the arbor, amid the perfumed vines, they embrace. At this mad moment, Count Orloff, jealously in love with Marjorie, despite the fact that she is his friend's wife, observing the reunited lovers, revengefully rushes to the Prince to tell him what he has seen. The royal Neapolitan goes to see for himself, but Miss Rhodes, Marjorie's keen-eared companion, overhearing the plot, rushes ahead of him, throws herself into Wilbur's arms and tells Marjorie to run away. The Prince comes, and, discovering them, is so excessively angry over Orloff's seeming mistake that he challenges him to a duel. In the meantime the young American officer has considerably disfigured the count for his mean spying habits. Before the duel the husband learns from his wife that she was and is in love with the American. He is a royalist and feels the point keenly, so he removed the bullet from his own weapon and allows Orloff to kill him—a sacrifice to sentiment. So the mansion of misery is transformed into a home of happiness.

THE STOLEN MOCCASINS (August 6).—Harden, a typical border tough, professes love for Belle; but she heroically repulses him in a way that infuriates. Jack, her sweetheart, hears of this and he tells Harden to "vamoos." Harden, with several choice spirits, after "irrigating" freely, goes to an Indian camp and steals several pairs of moccasins. They then, soft-footed, go to the cabin of Belle's father and in his absence carry away the girl. Jack is not slow in learning of her disappearance. He inquires of the Indians about her, but they deny knowledge other than of their own losses at the hands of Harden. Swift-Foot, a trailer, offers his services, and they trail the trio to a lonely cabin. Harden and his confederates put up a desperate defense, but Jack and his crowd outclass them as gun-men. The girl is rescued, and Harden, much the worse for wear, is taken back to the settlement to "get his."

THE GALLOPING ROMEO (August 7).—Col. Scarem covertly installs a burglar alarm in his house with the dial located in his room. When dashing Fred Fuller comes to elope with his beauteous daughter Bessie, they unconsciously set off the alarm, and the Colonel barricades himself in his room and excitedly phones the Sheriff that the expected burglars have come. A quick-acting posse swoops down and carries off Fred before he can explain, and the belated Sheriff captures Bessie as she comes through the window, thinking she is a burglar. Fred eventually convinces his captors of his identity and ventures back at once to get his little bride to be. In the dark he picks up the colored maid and carries her to the Parson's before he finds his mistake. Then he dashes madly back to the house—and just in time, for real bandits have followed the trail of the oversure Sheriff, and are holding up Bessie and her father.

THE GROCER'S REVENGE (August 7).—Hiram Snow, a mean and miserly man, who should be surnamed "Frost," has money, but he hates to part with it, particularly when it comes to sharing with members of his own family. His wife and two children have a hard time getting enough to eat, although he is one of the most affluent men in the village. He keeps such close tab on "the advanced cost of living" that he securely locks up the butter. Upon going to the closet he found that someone had been at it, which angered him so much that he refused to buy any more butter for their meals. He, however, thinks of himself, and on his trip to the grocery he cannot resist eyeing with envy a fine, rat roll of butter. The price is too high, and he sticks so closely to his money, but he surreptitiously puts a roll of butter under his hat. The keen-eyed groceryman sees this, but quickly decides a revenge upon the culprit's head. Snow expects to go home at once, but the groceryman gets in the village loiterers, the gossips and the chronic shoppers, and makes a ring around old man Snow and keeps him in proximity with a large stove. The consequence is that the crusty Snow is very freely oiled before he puts up the "ante" for the butter, and saves himself prosecution as a kleptomaniac and further trouble for his stinginess.

MISS ARABIAN NIGHTS (August 8).—Barbara Dean is a wealthy but lonely young woman, and wishing to emulate the example of the dreaming Arab, she poses as "Emily Stanton," a poor and struggling young writer, who lives in a shabby, genteel boarding house, peopled by brilliant young people who have failed to open the gates of opportunity that their merit would seem to command. Without their knowledge, she made two young artists fashionable successes; she gave a brilliant playwright a production of his work—a play that was the sensation of the year. Again she thus made it possible for him and his loyal little fiancee, who had stayed by him for better and worse, to marry in reality; likewise secured for the unlucky young actor the position of leading man, and brought to the poor but proud inventor, whom she really loved, the recognition that meant at once fame and fortune. But it almost broke the spell when she revealed her identity to her lover, for his pride revolted both at the deception and the marrying of one whose worldly goods was far greater than his own. But this obstacle she also overcame, and then Miss Haroun Al Raschid returned to her own estate spiritually richer by a hundredfold through these varied experiences than she had ever been before.

THE BROKEN VASE (August 12).—Mrs. Sanders returns from a shopping tour and secretly shows a beautiful locket that she has purchased as a birthday gift for her daughter. Surprised by the presence of the young lady, she drops the locket into a vase, as a convenient and secret receptacle. Mother and daughter leave the room, and the new maid, Ruth, comes in to tidy up the apartment, and with a long-feathered dust-brush she unfortunately sweeps the vase from the mantel and it lands on the floor with its superstructure smashed. The poor girl is much alarmed over the accident, but carefully gathering the lower bowl and shattered upper pieces in her apron she rushes out of the room. She goes to her little attic room, draws from her scant savings, rushes down to the ceramic shop, and feels fortunate that she is able to replace the vase, although the loss of her savings weighs heavily upon her. On her way back home she throws the original in an ash-heap. When Mrs. Sanders later looks into the vase after the locket and cannot find it, she immediately accuses the second maid of having stolen it, and, despite the tears of denial, rushes her off to a station-house, preferring a criminal charge. A poor beggar passed the ash-heap soon after Ruth dropped her vase, and, picking it up, found the locket still in the bowl. Thereupon he went to the pawnbroker's and endeavored to secure money upon it. That crafty individual, thinking he has stolen it, summons a policeman, and he arrives in the station-house coincident with the unfortunate servant maid. Mrs. Sanders immediately identifies the locket, gives willing ear to the explanation of Ruth, and the latter is restored to her good graces, while the beggar is adequately rewarded.

THE MAGICIAN FISHERMAN (August 12).—A magician passes on his weary rounds of entertaining to entertain himself, when he gets a letter from a country friend asking him to go fishing. He and his assistant load up with considerable baggage, including magic-paraphernalia and a large quantity of "snake medicine."

After they leave the railroad they are forced to take a stage to the distant fishing ground. Their vehicle breaks down in the far country, and the landlord of the hotel, who is a "smart Alec" in his way, thinking that all fishermen are green, and this particular pair are "suckers," puts up a job on the magician and his assistant. They get two carpenter trusses, place a horse-trough on them, and fill it with eight or ten tubs of water, after which they tack on a card marked "No fishing allowed." The landlord and his jocular assistants then hide behind a bush in the immediate neighborhood.

Billy, the assistant, is tired out, but Zamloch, the magician, urges him on. Billy is too weary to walk and sits down to smoke, while the wily magician with half an eye, sees that someone is trying to have game with him, and responds with interest. He gets a rod, puts on a line, baits it and casts the line into the water-trough. After waiting a little while he gets a bite, jerks the rod, but finds the bait is gone. He puts on more bait, drops the line in the water and catches a pound carp; then he catches a two-pound fish, a three-pound fish, a four-pound, and still larger. The jocular landlord behind the bush, in the meantime, is the most astonished man in the country—even the sleepy assistant is beginning "to sit up and take notice." The landlord, who has observed this proceeding with envy and amazement, gets a line in the trough himself from behind the bush and catches some rare game, varying from an old boot to a wreck of an umbrella, and finally a live snake that almost gets him when he hauls it out. When Billy sees the landlord flop the snake into the air, he runs to his rescue with a demijohn of "snake medicine." The landlord takes a long pull and resumes his fishing. Next time he gets a dead cat with a note tied around its neck labeled "Catfish," and in response to a final throw he brings up a demon dressed in red. This brings the landlord to his knees in a frightened state. Then the magician shows his audience that the trough, after all, is really empty, so the joke is on the jokers.

THE COAST OF CHANCE (August 13).—Flora Gilsey, a wealthy young lady with almost everything to have except a husband, was very much attached to Harry Crassy. The young people are interested in the $20,000 reward offered for the return of the famous "Crews Idol," which was a superb sapphire ring stolen at the auction sale of the Chatsworth Estate.

At the reception that follows, Flora is introduced to a mysterious young man named Kerr. Kerr and Crasay meet and the young men seem to be each trying to identify the other as associated with some sort of mystery.

Of course, there is a convenient orangery, where Flora and Harry retire, and he urges his suit. She declares that she will only accept a ring of absolute unique design. Another person to the quartette is Judge Buller, presumably much in love with Flora, who has secured a photograph of "Farrel Wand," a noted English crook, who is popularly supposed to have accomplished the theft of the sapphire. Harry takes his fiancée to a Chinese goldsmith and secures a beautiful sapphire ring of curious design, making her promise she will not wear it until it is reset.

Judge Buller has quite a skirmish of wit with the new man, Kerr, who appears particularly anxious to get a glance at the picture of the crook. While he is there, Harry also comes on the same errand, but is diplomatically put off. Flora, forgetting her promise to Harry, cannot refrain from wearing the ring, and Kerr, who is her companion that evening, is very much excited when he observes it, and at once asks where she got it. She is well-nigh in hysterics when she is discovered later by Harry, who charges her with having worn the ring. She has a second fit of nervousness upon entering her room and finding her friend, Clara, looking over her things, with the evident desire of finding some jewel, but she withdraws unobserved, as she feels her chief secret is safe.

Kerr, who is something of a hypnotist, makes love to Flora; she reveals to him the hiding place of the ring, but indicates that she should retain it. Clara, the friend of Flora, has secured the much-wanted photograph from the Judge, and is now haggling with Harry for a large sum of money to let him see it. As the result of this, he is very much agitated—tells Flora that their engagement is at an end, and demands the ring returned. Eventually, Clara shows Flora the photograph and it reveals the face of Harry Crassy. The upshot of it all is that Kerr is Sir Robert Chatsworth, the real owner of the ring, incognito. The cunning Chinaman has made a duplicate of the ring, and that is the ring that the graceless sharper takes from his fiancée. As her frail idol of love is shattered, she really finds that the man of her heart is Sir Robert Chatsworth.

AN APACHE'S GRATITUDE (August 14).—Bob Huntley, U. S. mail rider, while in performance of duty through a dangerous territory, comes across an Apache Indian who has been thrown from his horse and had his leg broken. Like a good Samaritan, he takes him to camp and earns his gratitude. Later the Indian witnesses a murder and secures evidence by getting possession of the gun which fired the fatal shot. Still later Huntley is accused of the crime and about to be hung on

BROWN'S NEW MONETARY STANDARD (August 15).—One Brown reads in an unveracious colored Sunday supplement that a process has been discovered for extracting gold from sea-water. As Brown is a student of 10-penny finance, he is impressed by this fact, and at once concludes that gold will soon be so cheap that copper will be far more valuable by comparison. He gets a wagon, goes down to the bank and converts $10,000 that he has there on deposit in gold into copper pennies, and then attempts to do all his business on the ten-mill basis. The transaction of large deals in coin of small denomination is rather difficult and embarrassing, not to remark overweighing patience on the part of purchaser. Brown's path is strewn with pennies that rise in mountains and fall in gulleys to obstruct his way. He goes out shopping with his wife, visits a millinery store, and pays ten thousand pennies for a hat. Then he goes to buy tickets for a theatrical matinee, pours out a pile of pennies on the glass counter, but the ticket seller merely orders him to take them away. Brown refuses, and a special officer is called, who threatens him with arrest. Brown leaves very angry, and the newsboys scramble for the pennies that he leaves as he is rushed on his way. He goes home, and fuel is added to his fever when a collector comes to present a bill, but will not accept the payment in coppers, "as pennies are legal tender to one dollar only." He has hardly gone away, refusing to accept, when another collector comes. He "falls for it" and is ballasted down so heavily with coppers that he man hardly walk. The collectors meet and exchange confidences, and the various grocery men and retail dealers in town, having received a line on Brown, refuse absolutely to do business with him. When he goes to church he loads the collection plate so full of pennies it is full to overflowing, and his efforts to put more on excite the risibilities of the congregation. The community at large have begun to think that Brown has copper on the "coco." He has lots of money, but he is a terrible nuisance. He finally reads a newspaper a week after his exploits that the bubble concerning the making of gold out of seawater has been exploded, and that Prof. Sharp, the man who proposed to do it, has been discredited as a fake. Brown gets his money back into the bank and his pennies into the proper channels of circulation—the hands of the newsboys.

THE OUTLAW'S GRATITUDE (August 11).—Standing in the cool waters of the village swimming-hole, Thad Cook shows his playmate his scar, a treasure obtained by a fall from the top of a Missouri pine. As the sport goes on, Ollie Gage, Thad's chum, is taken with a cramp, and Thad, diving quickly to his rescue, saves his friend from drowning. Twenty years later, in Gila county, Arizona, Ollie Cage is elected sheriff. John Moore, a miner, who has lost his health, is being cared for by his daughter, Ethel, and while walking through the woods they find a wounded outlaw, Robert Dare. Taking him to their cabin Ethel administers to him in such a way as to win his admiration and gratitude. Some weeks later, while in their vicinity, he returns to the cabin to see his little friend, and is startled to find the father very ill and the girl in despair, being without food or money. When Ethel tearfully explains her need of money to take her father to a city specialist, Dare remembers their kindness and determines to get the money for her. Sheriff Ollie Cage is startled to hear that the lonely station a Cila Springs has been robbed. Selecting his deputies he quickly closes in on the outlaw, who eludes the sheriff temporarily, bp a cunning piece of deception. Ethel and her father are surprised and thankful when Robert Dare enters their cabin and insists that Mr. Moore accept the needed money. Sheriff Cage enters and arrests Dare, an das he is slipping the handcuffs on him, the men look into each others' eyes and recognize each other. Gage remembering his Missouri chum's scar, opens Dare's shirt and reveals the mark that identifies Dare as his boyhood friend, Thad Cook. Taking in the situation, Gage tells Ethel that he has made a mistake and that Dare is not the man wanted. That night the sheriff of Gila county resigns.

INTO THE LIGHT (August 12).—Kate Hardy, a young girl, works in a department store for small wages and lives with her married sister. Kate dislikes her poor and sordid surroundings and determines she will not marry Dave Horton, who is little or no better off than herself. She loves Dave, but does not wish to struggle with circumstances. One day she is introduced to a young magazine illustrator, who is looking for types for magazine pictures. Hayward is struck with the girl's beauty and tries to induce her to become his model, for which she will be well paid. The picture of luxury on one side, and love in a cottage on the other, makes her very undecided, but she finally decides to accept the lure of the studio. Just as she is preparing to leave home, her sister has a bad fall and Kate returns to aid her. She then sees the love and terrible anxiety of Annie's husband, and like a flash she realizes how love can compensate for all adverse conditions. She goes to Dave, and poor as he is, they walk into the light together.

GOOD FOR EVIL (Special—2 parts—Aug. 14).—At Princeton college, John Field and Burt Mason are friends. On the eve of graduation they find that fate has swayed each individual destiny to bring about their separation. One is going to New York; the other to far-off Arizona. Arriving at Tucson, John is met by Densmore, the friend who has invited him there. Later he meets Grace Brooks, with whom he falls in love. Grace tolerates John's attentions and finally the two become engaged, though Grace is by no means so much in love as John. In the meantime, Burt has been going the pace that kills in New York and finds his health going back on him. His doctor assures him that he must either go West or die, so he writes to his old chum to tell him he is on the way to join him. John is delighted to get this letter and shows it to Grace with much pleasure. He meets Burt at the train. Later Burt and Grace meet and it proves a case of real love at first sight. Burt makes but feeble effort to fight against his passion, and one day the two tell John of the situation. Heartbroken, John pleads with Grace, but to no avail. Burt and Grace are married, and John, weary and torn by his experience, becomes a monk at the Catholic Mission of San Xavier. The years roll by. Burt has gone from bad to worse, and with his wife and child, a little girl of six, is living in poverty near Tucson. He is tired of life and determines to desert his wife and child. In an effort to leave the country he steals a horse, but is discovered and pursued. Desperate and wounded, he takes refuge in the mission, where he is protected and saved by his boyhood friend whom he had so shamelessly betrayed. The deserted wife has been taken back to her parent's home. John convinces Burt of his sin and goes with him back to seek forgiveness of his wife. At first she refuses to listen, but finally is influenced by John's pleas and agrees to take Burt back. The Monk then returns to his mission.

OVER THE CRIB (August 15).—Jerry Smithson is a lonely bachelor with a great and deep love for children. In desperation, and to smother the heart ache, he goes to the asylum, where he makes daily pilgrimages to watch the youngsters at play. About the same time a Mrs. Wendell, deserted by her husband, and almost destitute, takes her child to the asylum in the hope that it may be adopted by a family that will give it the care and love it needs. Smithson is the man that adopts the child, and Dorothy soon reigns complete mistress of the lonely bachelor's heart and home. Finding he, in his awkward, ignorant way, is unable to properly take care of her, he advertises for a day nurse, and Ethel Langdon, suffering from an equal amount of child hunger, applies for the position and gets it. The child, Dorothy, takes to Ethel at once and gradually Smithson finds himself in love with his adopted child's nurse. The culmination of their romance comes when Dorothy, playing a kissing game with the two, orders Smithson to kiss "nursie," and the door to a happy future is opened to both. They are married and very happy. Mrs. Wendell, however, finds herself in dire straits, and just about the time she thinks she can hear the fight no longer, her husband returns, penitent and rich. She forgives him and then he learns of the child's being sent to the asylum to be adopted. They go to the asylum and their terrible grief has its effect upon the authorities, and they let them have the child's address. Smithson breaks down under their plea, but Ethel realizes, great as her own misery is, that the real parents have a greater right than they to Dorothy. Dorothy is taken to her parents' home and Smithson alone gives way to his grief. Ethel, at the side of the empty crib, suffers cruelly at its emptiness and weeps over it. Then her sorrow changes gradually to another realization, and hurriedly she gets out some tiny baby clothes from her work basket, and at the side of the crib, with the tiny garments held tight to her breast, she smiles into a future brighter and fuller than even the wonderfully happy past has been.

DREGS (August 16).—Dregs is a sort of half-crook and half-mendicant. He finds himself one night, hungry to desperation. He takes his tools and bulls-eye and leaves for a round of the city. At the bread line, with the other dregs of the city, he gets a bit of bread and some hot coffee. His portion, however (hungry as he is), he gives to an old man that didn't get there in time. He goes to a bench in the park, famished and exhausted, and dozes. Meanwhile, Marjorie Nugent, a veritable angel of the slums, gets her husband to accompany her and she takes a basket of food to give to any poor unfortunates she may find in the parks. They go the rounds, and a curious policeman has to look over their basket, changing his attitude greatly when he discovers their mission of mercy. Dregs has dropped off into an exhausted sleep and imagines himself in a restaurant being served with all the best the house affords, and smoking a fine cigar. He comes to himself and finds Marjorie with the open basket of food on one side of him and her husband smoking a cigar on the other side. He is given what is left in the basket and they go home. Dregs finishes his repast to the last crumb, then feels for his bulls-eye and tools and shambles off as he sees a cop coming. Marjorie goes to bed and her husband tries to read, but falls asleep in his chair in the adjoining room. Dregs happens to pick out their house for the night's picking, and is hard at work when Marjorie gets up and walks through the adjoining room (in her sleep), without waking her husband. Dregs hears her entering the hall and ducks, leaving his bulls-eye. Marjorie (in her sleep), gets her hand on it, and is wandering about when Dregs slips back and discovers who she is. Meanwhile, Nugent awakes, and with his gun creeps downstairs. Dregs slips back of the window curtain and sees the husband in the doorway level his gun at the moving light, he not being able to see who is back of it. As he fires Dregs jumps between and takes the bullet. The light is switched on and Dregs lives long enough to beg forgiveness and exact a promise that Marjorie will never forget the Dregs.

SURPRISE FOR FOUR (August 16).—Mr. Jones and his son, Will, are rivals for the hand of Elsie Smith. Mr. Jones steals a march on his son by arriving at Elsie's home first and presents her with a bouquet that Will had bought for her. Elsie tries to make father feel at home and offers him some cake that she has baked herself. Father finds that the cake is so hard and heavy that he is unable to sink his teeth into it, and while Elsie is out of the room he throws the cake out of the window. Will, who has been standing under the window, receives the cake on his head; he picks it up and rushes into the house with it. Will arrives on the scene just as father is telling Elsie that the cake was delicious. Will tells Elsie that his father threw the cake out of the window. She begins to cry and goes to Will for consolation, while father leaves the room in a huff. Mrs. Smith, Elsie's mother, is very sweet on Father Jones and she sees him as he is taking his hat off the hall rack; she coaxes him to stay and talk to her. Mrs. Smith brings him some cake, at the sight of which he almost throws a fit. After seeing her eat some, he decides to try, and finds it very good. Mrs. Smith's good cooking wins father's heart; he proposes and is accepted. They decide to steal away from the young folks and get married. In the meantime, Elsie and Will have slipped off to be married, and when the two couples return from the minister's and tell each other that they have been married, it is a surprise for four.

BINGLES' NIGHTMARE (August 12).—Bingles falls asleep in a restaurant and dreams delightfully. Waiters and barbers refuse to accept tips. The conductor of a street car that passes him instead of stopping, has the car reversed and brought back to where he stands.

In the car he finds the ladies all standing and the men all sitting, a lady rising on his entrance to offer him her seat. At home Bingles receives a still greater surprise; he dreams that his wife has smoking jacket and warm slippers for him, that dinner is all ready and that she lights his cigar. Just at this point the waiter in the restaurant wakes him and tells him it is closing time, quickly bringing him back to earth by the reminder of the customary tip. Bingles realizes sorrowfully that he is still in the same old world after all.

THE JOYS OF A JEALOUS WIFE (August 12).—Mrs. Markham strongly objects to her husband even looking at another woman and does her best to keep him at her side. While on an ocean voyage she is obliged to leave him because of sea-sickness. Markham takes advantage of this to slip away and join a party of girls on the ship. He gets a friend to occupy his seat and to wear his coat, so that if his wife looks in that direction she will think him still in his place.

Mrs. Markham does look in that direction, but comes along also. She finds the friend, who she berates furiously. Then, going in search of her husband, she acts so frantically that the ship's doctor thinks she is insane and has her strapped down. Hubby comes along and effects her rescue, but not before he has given her time to think over her position and realize the foolishness of her conduct.

THE FLIRT (Aug. 13).—Having realized the weakness of his wife for flirtation, Robert Gordon determines to teach her a severe lesson. Robert brings home a friend, Carl Bressler, and introduces him to his wife. Dolores, of course, attempts to flirt with him and he is only too glad to reciprocate. The next day Robert brings home a beautiful pearl necklace to her and tells her to avoid Bressler. A day or two later he goes away, telling his wife that he is going on business and will be gone for a week and advises her to put her necklace in the safe. In reality he stays around where he can watch Dolores and see what she will do.

The day after he has gone, Dolores, in spite of what Robert has said to her, phones to Carl to come over to amuse her. He comes at once, and, seeing a beautiful necklace on her neck, he compliments her on it. Dolores tells him that she has a much finer one in the safe and offers to get it out to show him. Gordon has been hidden behind the curtains all the while and hears all that goes on. Giving her time to open the safe, he goes downstairs and a moment later returns, making a noise so that his wife will hear him coming. She flees from the room, hoping that her husband will think that Carl has just called and that she has not yet seen him.

Gordon enters the room, and, seeing the open safe, he accuses Carl of robbery, and telephones for the police. Then he calls his wife and tells her that Carl is a thief. Dolores is afraid to tell the truth and does not say anything that will prove Carl not guilty, although her husband gives her every opportunity to do so. It is not until the police actually arrive and prepare to take Dressler away that she takes any action to save him. Gordon dismisses the police and tells Bressler never to call at his house again. Dolores sees her fault and resolves never to flirt again.

KEEPING HUSBANDS HOME (Aug. 14).—Fred King calls at the office of his friend, John Carpenter, to ask him to a cabaret dinner that evening. John sends a telegram to his wife, saying that the manager is in town and that he has to take him out to dinner. Kate Carpenter, John's wife, is terribly disappointed when she receives her husband's message. When, after dinner, her friend Mrs. King comes around and she learns that she also has had a similar telegram to her own, Kate guesses that the two men are off together on a spree.

Next morning the two women meet and go to town together. First they call upon a carpenter and arrange for him to build a small stage in Mrs. Carpenter's dining-room. From there they go to the manager of a cabaret and arrange with him for the attendance of performers and musicians the next day. With the securing of a bartender and the necessary supplies for a bar, their activities for the morning are concluded. Mrs. King tells her husband that he is invited to go with her to Mrs. Carpenter's for dinner the next day, while Kate also informs her husband of the dinner engagement she has made with the Kings. John is rather bored by the idea of dinner at home, but cannot see his way out of it.

When the two men arrive at the house in the evening their wives take them to the bar and tell them to order whatever they please. They show considerable reluctance at leaving the bar for the dinner table when their wives call them.

As soon as dinner is started Mrs. Carpenter makes a sign to the maid and the curtains are drawn aside from the stage at the end of the room. The two men gasp with astonishment as the performers dance on, but getting the spirit of the thing they toast their wives and end the dinner by dancing a hilarious turkey-trot around the table with them. The two wives are thoroughly delighted with the success of their experiment and are filled with visions of husbands always at home to dinner in the future.

THE LADY AND THE GLOVE (Aug. 15).—The leading favorite of King Francis's court is the Lady Viola, a lady as witty as she is beautiful. She is courted by the Comte De Lorge and leads him on in his protestations of love. She does not really love him, but likes to keep him away from other women. The Queen secures a new lady-in-waiting, the Lady Anne, a charming young woman fully as beautiful as the Lady Viola, who at once becomes insanely jealous of her. The courtiers are soon at the feet of the new favorite, who shows her preference for none, save possibly the Comte De Lorge. The Lady Viola is furious and does all in her power to keep him away from her. By way of amusement, King Francis arranges a tournament of lions, at that time considered a royal sport. The front of the balcony overlooking the arena is occupied by the King and Queen and their principal attendants, among them the Lady Viola, the Lady Anne and the Comte De Lorge. Thinking to force a public showing of the Comte's love for her, the Lady Viola throws her glove into the arena among the lions and dares any man to retrieve it. The Comte, who sees perfectly well what is in the lady's mind, goes to the rail and prepares to descend. All watch the young man's descent with intense excitement, mingled with fears for his safety, with the exception of the Lady Anne, who cannot bear the sight, but faints away. De Lorge picks up the glove and gets back safely to his place on the balcony. Instead of humbly handing the glove to the Lady Viola, as she expects, he throws it in her face, publicly rebuking her. Then, seeing that the Lady Anne has fainted, he takes her in his arms and helps to revive her. His betrothal to the fair court beauty is at once announced and their marriage at the Cathedral is performed amid great pomp and splendor in the presence of the King and Queen and the whole of his glorious court.

FATHER AND SON; or THE CURSE OF THE GOLDEN LAND (Special, 2 parts—Aug. 9).—Wolf Salzman leaves his wife, Sarah, and Alex, his son, with his parents in Russia and sets off to America. He perseveres, and soon becomes the chief designer for the clothing firm that employs him. Intoxicated by his success he forgets his wife and child and after a time ceases to write to them. Meeting Miss Morganstern, the daughter of the head of a rival clothing firm, he falls in love with her and prepares to divorce his wife so that he may marry the young woman. Sarah is in despair at not hearing from her husband and eventually sails for America, intending to seek him out, convinced that some misfortune must have befallen him.

The firm of Morganstern & Son suffers severely from the competition of the firm employing Wolf and tries to secure his services. Wolf insists that if he work for Morganstern he shall be made a partner of the firm. Morganstern reluctantly agrees, with the proviso that Wolf change his name to that of Victor, his former partner. Wolf's identity being lost, Sarah and Alex, who have arrived in New York, are unable to find him. Their little stock of money being gone, they are reduced to severe distress, but at length they manage to obtain employment, Alex as an errand boy and his mother as a finisher, both working for the firm of Morganstern.

Sarah and Alex are proudly acknowledged by Wolf as his wife and son and he does his best to atone for the great wrong he had done against them.

ESSANAY.

THE EDGE OF THINGS (August 12).—Charles Rogers, a ranchman in the far West, received a letter from his Eastern partner, George Clayton, saying that he was coming on a visit to the ranch and see how things were progressing. Roger's wife, Evelyn, falls an easy victim to the winning ways of the city man, and becomes madly infatuated with him. One day her husband finds her in his arms and then the heavens fall. In his thirst for revenge, he invites Clayton to go hunting and entices him to the top of a steep precipice, where he attempts to throw him over. The way things turn about, in which Clayton saves Rogers' life, is entertaining in the extreme. Just see it.

GOOD NIGHT NURSE (August 13).—Tom Carr, touring the country in his new machine, has a puncture. While the chauffeur is repairing it, Tom takes a stroll and meets Sylvia Scott, whose father runs a sanitarium for nervous disorders. Tom thinks Sylvia is an inmate and by a clever ruse enters the sanitarium as a patient. What they do to Tom in the way of severe treatments for nervousness is a caution. Just see how he gets out of it.

UP LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN ON THE ELECTRIC INCLINE (August 13).—A beautiful scenic picture showing the hills and valleys surrounding Lookout Mountain, Tenn. One sees the deep grade of from 40 to 72% at which the car travels downward, immense cables holding the car from slipping.

THE WORLD ABOVE (August 14).—Ruth, the janitor's daughter, is taken by her father to one of the sumptuous apartments upstairs, and is overwhelmed by the splendor and beauty of it all. Mr. Remington, the owner of the apartment enters, and seeing Ruth so interested, explains to her the origin of the various ornamental pieces that decorate the apartment. Downstairs, in her squalid surroundings, she is very unhappy after seeing her world above, and tells her sweetheart that she cannot marry him, that she must marry a man of wealth. The thrilling scenes that follow and her rescue from the man of the world above by her sweetheart, makes Ruth decide that the world in which she is living is better than the artificial life of the Remington's above.

THE MAN IN THE CABIN (August 16).—Broncho Billy, a dangerous character, is captured. On the way to jail, the sheriff stops at Evelyn's house for something to eat. Broncho Billy becomes infatuated with Evelyn and attempts to talk to her, but the men prevent it. On the day of the trial, Broncho Billy, in a clever manner, gets the sheriff's gun and, although handcuffed, holds up the whole courtroom. He then escapes to the woods, goes to Evelyn's house, where he enters and attempts to force his attentions on her. She attracts the attention of her Indian servant, and in the sign language, tells him to get help. He meets the sheriff and posse, who gallop furiously to the cabin and rescue Evelyn. Broncho Billy is again arrested and locked behind the iron doors.

ALKALI IKE'S GAL (Special—2 parts—August 15).—"A stitch in time saves nine," thought Alkali Ike, as he sat on the edge of the bed and tugged furiously at a patch on his corduroy trousers. Interrupted by the mail carrier, Alkali makes a break for the door, only to discover that his trousers are sewed to the quilt. Furious, he wraps the quilt about him, the trousers dangling by his side, takes the letter from the mailman and retires to read the contents. Slippery Slim, Mustang Pete and Rawhide Bill are presented with similar letters. The Dotty Matrimonial Agency offers reduced rates on June brides. The letter appealed to the four men of the West to get married and be happy. Photo of stock enclosed, gives the prospective bridegrooms an idea of what the matrimonial agency offers. "She's a bear," exclaims Alkali Ike, as he tears a calendar from the wall and writes a very flattering note, inviting the young lady whose picture adorns the advertisement, to come on the Friday stage, that he will meet her at the crossroads and will wear a white rose. Unaware that any of the residents of Snakeville had received letters from the matrimonial agency, and unknown to each other, Slippery Slim, Mustang Pete and Rawhide Bill write, telling the young lady to come, and that they will meet her Friday, and will wear white roses. The letters are placed in the mail box. Alkali mails his letter, and much is his surprise when he discovers three other letters in the box addressed to the same party. He destroys the three, places his own letter in the mail box, and retires to his bunk house, to dream of the fair lady, who is to meet him on Friday. Friday sees Alkali Ike in his Sunday-go-to-meeting clothes, seated on a huge rock in the road, wearing the only white rose that Snakeville possessed, in his lapel. Here he waits patiently for the advertised beauty. Sophie arrives on the stage four hours late, and finds her Romeo asleep at the switch. She roughly awakens the sleeper by sitting on him. Much is Alkali Ike's surprise when he discovers that it is his Sophie, and rewards himself by giving her a huge kiss.

Slippery Slim, thinking his letter had been delivered in good order, dresses himself in his best, and strolls to the rose bush, where he discovers that the only rose has disappeared. While sadly pondering over his misfortune, Mustang Pete and Rawhide Bill arrive on the scene, where they join in the tearful quest. Imagine the surprise, if you can, when they see Alkali Ike strolling towards his home, with the fair and sylphlike (300-lb.), Sophie on his arm. "Revenge," the cry, as they rush into Alkali Ike's bunk house. Here they discover a note which reads as follows: "Dear Alkali—Sorry I cannot get over to see your Ada and her baby." This the trio present to the new arrival, which settles Alkali Ike's hash then and there. Alkali turns the tables on his rivals, however, and wins the hand of the fair Sophie in spite of them all.

THE RIGHTFUL HEIR (August 12).—A story of a hunchback with a beautiful young wife, of a lost will, a treacherous servant and a gallant young lover, who is the real heir to Pontiac Manor. Fiendish jealousy kills the hunchback after he has wounded his rival in a duel.

BATTLEFIELDS AROUND CHATTANOOGA (August 13).—We are upon the site of some of the greatest and bloodiest battles of the Civil War. Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain will live as long as the history of the war endures. Views of many famous spots and of the winding Tennessee River make a most interesting picture.

THE RIGHT NUMBER BUT THE WRONG HOUSE (August 13).—It was all due to the stupidity of the man who put the house number on up side down. When a strange man came into Mrs. Smith's house and insisted that he was her father-in-law, it is no wonder that she 'phoned hubby and had the man ejected.

THE COAST GUARD'S SISTER (August 15).—A thrilling tale of a young Cornishman who is driven into smuggling by the jealousy of the village belles. The loyalty of one prevents the treachery of the other, but not until her lover has had a very narrow escape.

THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN (August 16).—The familiar story of the piper whose charmed notes enticed the rats of Hamelin into the river Weser, and the children of the village into the heart of a mountain, has been told in a magnificent fashion. A village was especially constructed for this film.

THE TREASURE OF CAPTAIN KIDD (August 11).—The story of this film begins with the ominous day on which Lord Bellomont gave William Kidd a commission to rid the seas of pirates. Instead of complying with Lord Bellomont's desires, Kidd immediately commenced a series of piratical attacks at first on French and Spanish vessels and later on ships of all nationalities indiscriminately. Coming to America in the "Quedah Merchant" to dispose of his enormous treasure, Kidd goes ashore at Corlear's Hook accompanied by a young pirate named Clarke. Clarke is deeply in love with Hannah, a young girl of the village. Kidd, secretly captivated by Hannah's beauty, consents to her accompanying the "Quedah Merchant" when it sails.

Once away from land, Kidd attempts to force his attentions on Hannah. She repulses him scornfully, and in a rage he vows to revenge himself. The ship is anchored off a deserted beach and the treasure loaded in boats and taken ashore. Kidd selects the hiding place by a series of careful measurements and the gold is buried in the sand. When the last shovelful is turned, Kidd draws his cutlass and steps toward Hannah. He announces his intention of slaying her immediately that the treasure may have a ghost to guard it. From this terrible position Hannah is saved by the bravery of her lover who successfully defies the great pirate, and the two lovers stand watching as the man of many crimes goes on his way.

BY FIRE AND WATER (August 9).—Richard Garvie, a prosperous young boatman, owns a small pleasure craft on which he frequently takes his wife and son for short outings. Mabel, his wife, objects strenuously to her husband's diregard of the appearance of the boat. She holds Herbert Wayne, one of his business rivals up to him as a model and asks him why he doesn't buy a new boat and a fine yachting coat with brass buttons. Finally, after working herself up into a terrible fit of temper, Mabel vows never to set her feet in the dirty old tub again.

To take a Sunday School class on an outing, Carvie's and Wayne's boats are both engaged. Mabel takes her little son, and true to her promise refuses to go into her husband's boat. Instead she and her boy go on Wayne's speedier and more up-to-date craft. Suddenly the faster boat is found to be on fire. A dingey is lowered and filled with passengers while Mabel runs down to the cabin for her boy. The smoke pours out, and the boat pushes off without her. After they have left the ship, the crew of the dingey realize that Mabel has been left, but dare not return and endanger the whole boat load.

Dick Garvie sees his wife's peril through a glass, and despite the protests of his passengers hurries to her aid. Mabel fastens a life-belt on her little son, throws him overboard, and sinks fainting on the deck. The boy is picked up by the other life-boat. Dick nearing his rival's boat, plunges overboard, climbs aboard the burning craft, picks up the unconscious Mabel and swims back to his own boat.

In the last scene, Richard and Mabel are shown at the wharf. He steps into his boat, and reappears, dressed in a blue coat with brass buttons. She smiles at him a little wistfully, and then coming closer asks him softly to forgive her. Then, with the boy in her arms, she steps aboard the once despised boat.

SHIPWRECKED (Special—2 parts—Aug. 6).—When Jones, a valet, is recommended to millionaire Jelds, he is found to be the beau ideal of his class—servile, soft spoken and with apparently no ambition other than to wait on his master. Patricia Jelds, the millionaire's daughter, has an ardent admirer in Howard Gibbs Paxon, a young society man. They are together constantly, boating, golfing, and motoring. While not formally engaged, it is generally understood that they are to marry. Jelds and his family embark on a southern cruise. Young Paxton is a member of the party and as Jones has made himself practically indispensable, he also accompanies them as general factotum. Young Paxon proposes to Patricia. The girl hardly knows her own heart. However, class environment wins. She has never thought of marrying any other person and accepts. While walking about the deck, Patricia idly picks up a book that lies in a steamer chair. It is "The Equality of Man" and she finds that it belongs to Jones. It seems ludicrous to think of the humble valet entertaining socialistic ideas, but he gravely assures her that such is the case. Patricia discovers that Jones has greater depth than she imagined. While steaming through the beautiful tropics the terrifying cry of "a leak!" is heard. All hands take to the life-boats and pull away from the great mass of steel just in time to see it sink below the ocean's bosom. They are tossed about for two weary, dreary days. The water supply is low and the men are half crazed when land is sighted. They gather their remaining strength and pull madly for the shore.

As the life-boats approach the shore, a coral reef and the heavy surf capsizes them. Too weak to swim, the small party is washed in by the tide. Upon regaining consciousness hours later, the survivors find themselves helpless. These wealthy persons who have had servants at their every beck and call find Jones the man of the hour. Jones, the humble valet, Jones, the worm whom they have scarcely noticed, is elected head of the community. A sea tortoise is captured. Bananas and edible root sare found, but when it becomes necessary to prepare the food, all turn to Jones. He apportions the various tasks. When Patricia indignantly refuses to cook, Jones quietly says, "They who do not work, shall not eat." The girl meekly does as she is bidden. A chest containing a canister of gunpowder and a bottle of whiskey is washed ashore. Young Paxon and two sailors steal the whiskey when it is put aside for emergency. Crazed by the liquor, Paxon is brought back to camp by Jones. Another man is found in the sand—dead. So ends the terrible punishment for the first crime in the little community. Several days later the camp is attacked by boatloads of savages. The party is again saved by Jones. Patricia realizes that she cares for the man. Jones knows it and when he sights a sail unknown to the others, he has a terrible mental struggle. He knows that Patricia is his if she stays on the island, but if they are rescued she will go back to her own kind. But Jones is a real man and hails the vessel. The party is rescued. Months later Patricia finds that she cannot marry Paxon. She is thinking of the humble valet who proved himself a man among men. And in a different corner of the world Jones has discovered the talents with which God endowed him and is struggling to make himself worthy of Patricia and her high estate.

THE ALIBI (August 9).—Young Richard Breton gets into an altercation with Marshall, but friends interfere before matters become too serious. Later in the day the hot-headed fellow takes exception to a remark of Hardy's and threatens him. Marshall is present and witnesses the affair.

Breton and McFadden are partners in the ownership of a mine which they wish to have developed. McFadden decides to go east and interest some capitalists. Breton drives him to the train and in the rush loses his hat. As they have but a few moments to make the train there is no time to recover the hat.

Marshall, who has been waiting for an opportunity to wreak vengeance on Breton, finds the hat, which he places beside the body of Hardy, whom he has shot. A crowd quickly gather and things look black for Breton.

When Breton returns and learns of the charge against him he seeks the aid of his sister, Paula, who is the wife of Sheriff White. He manages to communicate with her and asks her to hold off the sheriff and his posse until he can get in touch with McFadden, the partner, and establish an alibi. Paula dons her brother's clothes and is pursued by the posse, while Breton telegraphs to McFadden.

Paula holds off her husband and his men through the night. When her purpose is about to be thwarted the alibi is established and Marshall pays the penalty for his crime.

FOR HER SISTER'S SAKE (August 11).—When May Morely leaves for college her elder sister Margaret stays at home with their father. Morely is delighted when John Coates, a rising young artist, visits him for a week and is further pleased when Margaret and Coates become engaged. They are together constantly and the days slip by almost unnoticed, but at last Coates has to leave on a sketching trip. He meets May on his journey and they become attached. She is unaware of his identity, however, and he of hers. The girl is very young and is thrilled by their unconventional little visits. The artist discovers that his feeling for Margaret was only infatuation, while he is deeply in love with May. He finds that this cannot go on forever and leaves suddenly, sending a message to May telling her why he has no right to be with her.

The girl is heartbroken and returns home for her vacation. Coates goes back to the house and finds to his dismay that the little girl he met on his journey is none other than his fiancee's sister. Margaret sees that her sister is in love with Coates and plans a noble sacrifice. The artist finds an empty canoe one evening with Margaret's hat in it. A year passes. Coates returns as May finds a message from her sister requesting that she marry the artist. They are married. Many months later the little family sits about the fireplace when the door opens and Margaret, radiantly beautiful, comes in and they realize the depth of her sacrifice.

THE SKELETON IN THE CLOSET (Special—2 parts—August 13).—Kitty Hawkins, who teaches school in the West, returns to her father's ranch to discover that he is implicated with cattle thieves. Fearing that Kitty will thwart his operations Hawkins makes her accompany him on the expeditions. Mason, one of the rustlers, forces his attentions upon the girl and declares that a horse thief's daughter is none too good for him. Kitty quietly leaves home and joins a party of settlers.

Indians attack the party and after a desperate battle Kitty is the sole survivor. She is found by Dan, the deputy sheriff, who carries her to the humble home where he and his superior have bachelor quarters. When Kitty regains her strength she is induced to stay and keep house. Both men love the girl, but she finally gives her hand to the sheriff. Dan, brokenhearted, finds another home.

Mason, the trouble-maker, arrives in the little village. By threatening to inform the sheriff of his wife's antecedents, he extorts money from Kitty. The girl confides in Dan and the sheriff misconstrues their quiet conference.

Dan gives Mason one hour to get out of town. The sheriff is paid a large sum for protecting a shipment of bullion. When Mason, who sees the transaction, follows the sheriff, and attempts to rob Kitty when she is entrusted with the money,

THE MILLIONAIRE AND THE GOOSE (August 15).—Bill's little farm near the village is none too profitable, but he manages to make a living by the sale of his geese. The chef at the Hotel Stratford declares they are the best in the country.

One day Bill offers hospitality to a passing prospector, who rewards him with a few nuggets of gold. Later, while delivering a goose at the hotel, Bill sees that Rocks, the noted millionaire, is spending a brief vacation at the resort. A wild scheme comes to him. Bill cracks up the nuggets with corn and feeds his geese. He takes particular pains to see that the next offering for the hotel is well fed.

The chef startles the little party on the front porch by declaring that Bill's land must be full of gold, as the geese are eating it. The wise old farmer insists that his place is not for sale, but finally submits to the overtures of Rocks. While the millionaire and his men dig up the ground, Bill enjoys a ride on the train.

THE AMATEUR BURGLAR (August 15).—Numerous burglaries in the neighborhood alarm Mrs. Brown, but her husband insists that there is no danger. To prove it he pays his clerk to enter the house in the guise of a burglar, it being Brown's plan to overpower the masked intruder in his wife's presence. Trouble ensues when a real burglar enters and refuses to be bullied. Later, Mrs. Brown punishes the clerk. All in all it is a busy night and Brown has to square himself with his persecuted employee.

THE ESCAPE (August 16).—Jim Bolt, a desperate convict, succeeds in escaping from the prison. He skulks through the woods with the prison guards in pursuit and finally takes refuge in an old barn.

Jack, the young son of farmer Binns, proves unpopular with his playmates, and entertains himself with a copy of "Lariat Bill, the Terror of the West." The style of literature does not appeal to the father, who reprimands the lad. Jack, finding a piece of rope, goes into the woods and climbs a tree, where he makes a lariat and implores an Indian or a buffalo to come his way.

Meanwhile the children, who have been playing in the yard, go into the barn during their game of hide and seek. Bolt, who has covered himself with hay, is disturbed. Through a knothole he sees the guards, who have found his trail, are about to enter. Picking up one of the children he backs out of the building, using the little one as a shield.

As the convict passes under the tree, Jack, discovering the little girl's peril, tosses his lassoo and captures the fugitive. Farmer Binns and the guards hasten to the spot and the desperate man is conducted to prison. Jack is rewarded by being allowed to finish "Lariat Bill."

ECLIPSE.

THE MONG-FU-TONG (Special—2 parts—August 12).—Dead across the office floor lay the bank cashier. The mystery of the dastardly murder was too deep for the Paris police; so "Arizona Bill," an American cowboy stranded in Europe, was called. An all night vigil in the office showed Arizona Bill the method of murder.

Bill gave chase in an automobile. There's a hand-to-hand battle in two fast moving automobiles resulting in the capture of five Chinese of the "Mong-Fu-Tong." How Bill was himself taken, his tortures at the hands of Mong-Fu; the clever ruse by which Bill's wife was captured and her splendid knife duel with Mong-Fu; the thrilling escape from the den when fire burst from a dozen windows—all combine to realize the uttermost in spectacular effects, convincing acting and absorbing story.

CINES.

THE HOUSE OF MYSTERY (Special—2 parts—August 8).—Danton passed a millinery shop, saw a pretty hat and bought it for his financee. Inez wore it—and then all sorts of mysterious things began to happen! Wherever Inez went money and jewelry were roughly crowded into her pockets! The police were helpless. And then suddenly, Inez disappeared. Danton grew desperate and sought out Henry Sterret, a famous detective, who agreed to undertake the case.

Sterret soon solved some of the mystery of that dainty bit of headgear. Madeline, his assistant, purchased one and immediately became the recipient of money and jewelry. What happened to her and Sterret, the thrilling rescue of Inez from The House of Mystery, makes a film that for absorbing story, dramatic situations, spectacular effects and convincing acting, is the vast exception among multiple reel subjects.

EVERY DOUBLE CAUSES TROUBLE (August 12).—The inimitable Whiffles learns that he bears a close resemblance, in fact, is a double to the newly appointed secretary of Aviation, and being curious, he goes to the secretary's home. When the latter comes out, Whiffles goes in and his face being the double of the secretary's, he is admitted without question to the private office. Here he discovers that the secretary has two appointments—one at three o'clock with the Ambassador of Hoboken and one at four o'clock with the secretary's sweetheart. When the ambassador calls, he and Whiffles exchange notes of doubtful courtesy through the medium of the butler and the ambassador departs in high dungeon. Successful in this, Whiffles decides to call on the secretary's sweetheart and gets away with it until the secretary himself arrives.

THE ERRING BROTHER (August 13).—Dan and Tom Reilly work on the same ranch. Tom is a wild boy and gets into trouble with the ranch owner. Dan comes to his brother's rescue at the height of the altercation. They are both discharged. In a moment of drunken frenzy, Tom kills a man and makes his escape with his sweetheart Lillian. With their home shattered, Dan quits ranching and becomes a travelling salesman for a product which takes him from ranch to ranch. A few years after the murder, Dan finds Lillian and while waiting for his brother to come in, shows Lillian how the magic silver plate, which he sells, operates. This silver plate is poison. In the meantime, Tom who is still frequenting saloons is recognized as the murderer wanted by the police and is pursued. Reaching home he dashes into the cabin while the others are barricading the house. He reaches a glass receptacle which apparently holds water and takes a drink. The hand of fate had directed him to the cup of poison and he dies before his pursuers can reach him. After his death Lillian finds real happiness in marrying Dan.

THE HOUSE DIVIDED (August 14).—This is a Mexican story in which a federal officer's sister is in love with a rebel. Through many thrilling scenes, the rebel Jose leads the pursuing federals and many times finds an opportunity to see his little sweetheart though he risks his life to do so. Once when visiting her he is discovered by her brother and placed under arrest but through her efforts he escapes. In punishment for her aiding the rebel, she is locked in her room and here when Jose comes to rescue her he is caught and lead out to be executed. In one last effort to save the life of her sweetheart, Dolores rushes to the scene of execution and throwing herself into his arms is pierced by the same bullets which end the rebel's life.

COSMOPOLITAN LIFE IN CAIRO (Egypt) August 15).—The life in Cairo is certainly cosmopolitan and we see it in all its phases in this film. The native streets swarming with Arab life,—the snake character—the street singers—the dancers all are pictured plying their various trades and winning the shekles from the innocent tourist. The beauties of the Nile—the crude methods of transportation—the marvelous pyramids—and the inscrutable sphinx are faithfully portrayed.

ON THE LAKES OF BAYRISCH (Bavaria) (August 15).—This film takes us into Bavaria, a land little known by those who have not traveled extensively. The Bayrisch lakes are gems of beauty, set in the surrounding hills like emeralds. Wide expanses of water invite the lover of aquatic sports and the natives add a touch of color which makes the scene one of unending pleasure and one long cherished in the memory of the beholder.

PICTURESQUE JURA (France) (August 15).—This little frequented spot in France is well worth the attention of the tourist abounding as it does in verdant valleys and luxuriant vegetation. Winding roads zig zagging up the mountain side afford many opportunities for beautiful vistas across miles and miles of picturesque grandeur. After a lovely view of the River Bienne at Malinges, we conclude with "Evening on the lake of Chalin." A picture of magic beauty, this—the expanse of peaceful water in the foreground; in the background, the mountains fading away in the darkening distance.

THE TURNING POINT (August 16).—Here we have a film dealing with the most fascinating subject: the efforts of a band of criminals to obtain a very valuable picture. Their tool is a woman, who in the power of the leading criminal, attempts to secure the picture by making love to the owner of it. She succeeds in winning his love but also awakens her own and with it her conscience and a desire to live a right life. Her struggle for freedom from her evil associations and the determination of the criminals not to lose so valuable an assistant forms one of the most interesting and melodramatic films released in a good many months.

THE LOVE LETTER (August 5).—Max, while on one of his usual gumshoes for excitement, pays rather marked attention to the occupants of a certain house where a lady of exquisite beauty has been noted by his eagle eye. One day she hands him a note, but the wind catches it before he has a chance to read it, and leads him to one hundred and one queer, outlandish places, and many adventures. Ultimately he captures the note, but finds that it is in Sanscrit. After tremendous efforts he finds a place where such things are translated, and learns, much to his chagrin, all the lady has to say. What's in the note is too good to tell. Better see the film and see for yourself.

A WOMAN'S WAY (August 9).—A young broker loses all his money and all his wife's money, and as a result, his wife leaves home and returns to her father, and the husband, after vainly trying to see her for many months, goes West. His wife gets a divorce and marries another. One day wife and former husband meet and he tries to persuade her (little knowing of her second marriage), to return West with him. She, though she loves him, loves money more and sticks to her second husband.

MELIES.

SNAPSHOTS OF JAVA (August 7).—An interesting educational of scenes in the daily life of the great and the small cities of Java, Dutch East Indies, including: Solo, Java—the chancellor and lesser officials returning from the "Kraton," or palace of the Sultan of Solo, where they go each day to receive food and supplies from the monarch for his official family; a gateway to a native village in that principality; lively market scene in the streets of Djokfokarta, and a street scene in Montilan.

The primitive method of rolling the roads with roller and oxen is shown to advantage. A Japanese fishing village with all its native beauty, and a cemetery with its grand stairway of approach, and the odd custom of the natives of taking a meal with their dead in spirit is also shown.

Finally a panorama from atop the Temple of Boro-Boedoer shows the gardens and some of the bell shrines of this beautiful temple.

THE ROBBER OF ANGKOR (August 14).—A rich young native and his wife are attacked by robbers near the ruins of Angkor-Wat. The husband is left for dead on the ground, but the wife is rescued and the booty recovered by a young European named Clive. The latter carries the bereaved woman to the rest house at the ruined temple. The robber chief, Tantia, by name, tries to get his followers to pursue Clive, but they are afraid of his gun and refuse. So Tantia goes after him alone. The husband, recovering from his temporary insensibility, follows his wife and her protector. When he sees them among the ruins, he thinks he is forgotten and betrayed. Tantia, disguised as a Buddhist priest, fans his jealousy, and gets him to steal the white man's gun. He then reveals his own identity, and to further his own end of getting the girl into his possession, helps the husband in an attack on Clive. But the husband is disarmed and Tantia falls a victim to the gun, which has been restored to its owner by the nimble wit of the woman. Husband and wife are restored to each other's love.

BIOGRAPH.

I WAS MEANT FOR YOU (August 11).—Theron is Lavina's natural choice, though she imagines herself in love with Luke, who is secretly loved by Lavina's sister, Susan. Susan sees that the couple are ill-suited to each other and adopts her own means to break the match. She is successful, but it is not until all have passed through a stirring and leavening experience that each couple realizes they were meant for each other.

AN INDIAN'S LOYALTY (August 16).—Suspected of theft, the Indian was discharged on the ranch-hand's accusation, but the foreman's suspicions against the hand were confirmed in time to reinstate the Indian. In gratitude the Indian captured the thief with the ranchero's money and saved the girl as well.

PAPA'S BABY (August 14).—To be a fond and devoted parent, and to be unable to play with the heaven of your heart is indeed a cruel decree. That was the case of Papa Binks, but he outwitted Mrs. Binks and the nurse in a very effective, yet unostentatious manner, while he and the baby had the time of their lives.

COME SEBEN, LEBEN (August 14).—"Mr. Toot Williams, Craps," was a prominent sign in Coonville. Toot knew how to "throw the bait," and Rufus was "cleaned" only to be coaxed back. That was how Lily got her "glad rags." Other gentlemen friends and husbands sought like luck at Toot's. That was where Toot came to his Waterloo. He threw "bait" at the wrong point.

THE DEATH STONE OF INDIA (3 parts—August 5.)—As six priests are in prayer in the Temple of Buddah, a band of marauding coolies sweep down and annihilate them. The last priest to die, perceiving that the coolies are taking the sacred eye of Buddah—a precious stone—curses the stone and exclaims that the possessor of it shall die. He then passes away. The coolies arrive at the desert, where they begin to quarrel about the emerald. One by one they die and the surviving coolie grasps the stone and runs away with it to the jungle, where fear and excitement make him a madman. Casting the stone into the air, it hangs suspended, and, as the maddened coolie falls dead upon the ground, the stone descends upon his breast, where it is found by a caravan of merchants, one of whom appropriates it. The merchant goes to the bazaar at the English barracks, at Cawnpore, India, where he sells the stone to Sir Hugh Wheeler and his niece. Just as the transferring of the stone has been completed, the merchant is seized with an attack of fever and dies. Several days later, as Sir Hugh and others are admiring the stone, a dispatch comes to him bearing the news that the fanatical Sepoys have thrown down their arms and deserted, having been told by a Buddha priest that they are being defiled with greased bullets and that he had better prepare for immediate defense. Nana Sahib, a treacherous man, offers his assistance to Sir Hugh, which is gladly accepted. Back in the temple the High Priest Djalma sees in a vision Sir Hugh and his niece admiring the stone with the sinister Nana Sahib standing in the background with upraised knife. He makes a passionate vow that he will devote his life to regain the stone.

When Cawnpore is invested, Nana, who had promised to take care of the English troopers, the invalids, the women and the children, fails to keep his promise and the troopers are killed, while the women and children are hustled into the old barracks. This also is seen by the High Priest Djalma in a vision as he stands before the Idol of Buddha in the temple. The Sepoys, having been defeated by the advancing troopers of General Havelock, avenge themselves by slaughtering the women and children. A Hindu woman with a white baby escapes. In the temple the high priest throws incense on the brazier, and again in a vision he sees the Hindu woman give the baby to a Sepoy coolie who is in a boat, he having escaped after having looted the bodies of the dead and found the emerald. The old priest makes a solemn vow that the baby boy shall grow up and reclaim the stolen eye and that he shall adopt the boy.

Twenty-five years later the emerald, after having passed through many bands and each time causing a calamity, finds its way into the possession of Colonel Van Alston, his wife and daughter, Nellie. The High Priest Djalma, now an aged man, realizing that his days are numbered, calls the little boy he adopted years ago, now known as Afga, the White Priest, and makes him swear that he will devote his entire life to the restoring of the eye of Buddha. Afga promises and the old priest passes away. Taking his ball of crystal he concentrates his mind upon it and sees in it Nellie at a reception with the emerald around her neck. That night, as Afga throws incense on the brazier, he sees in the smoke that rises, Nellie, admiring the emerald and gently refusing the proposal of a suitor. She suddenly falls in a trance, in which she sees Afga and the idol of Buddha with the missing eye. Recovering her senses again, Nellie becomes very ill and the doctors advise a change in climate. Just about this time the colonel is ordered to take his regiment to Cawnpore, India. In taking in the sights of that city, they eventually come to the Temple of Buddha, where Nellie meets Afga. Nellie continues to be sick, and one of her attendants, a native coolie, seeing the emerald about her neck, goes to the head of his sect and tells him of the emerald. He is given silken cords with which to hang Nellie. Meanwhile, Afga calls upon the colonel and asks to cure his daughter. He is given permission, and almost simultaneously with the laying of his hand upon her brow, she gets well. That night in the temple, Afga sees in a vision Nellie being maltreated by the coolie thugs. He goes at once to her rescue and transforms the leader into a dog. The rest slink away in mortal fear. He takes Nellie home and leaves.

The next day Nellie goes to the temple and is taken before the Idol of Buddha. Pointing to the eye socket Afga tells her of the story of the emerald. Impulsively she gives him the precious stone, and immediately after it is placed in the socket it flares fire. They then go to the colonel, the history of the young man is told, and he is recognized as Nellie's accepted suitor.

CAMPAIGNING WITH CUSTER (2 parts—August 12).—General Custer is stationed at Fort Riley to suppress the uprisings of the rebellious Sioux. He dispatches his aide, Captain Clifford, with an important message to Fort Wallace. Clifford, on his way, is met by an Indian maiden, Neesha, who pleads with him to come to the rescue of her sweetheart, Swift Foot, who is involved in a fight with Wolf Fang, a renegade Sioux, who is envious of Neesha's love for Swift Foot. Clifford interferes between the combatants and drives Wolf Fang away, and in doing so, he incurs the hatred of Wolf Fang, and the latter vows to get revenge on Clifford. Clifford later captures a whiskey runner, selling liquor to Wolf Fang and his companions. He arrests the boot-legger and drives the Indians away. Incensed over this interference and inflamed by liquor. Wolf Fang incites his companions to attack an approaching stage coach which has among its passengers, Gen. Custer's two nieces, Gertrude and Phyllis. During the running fight between the stage coach guards and the Indians, one of the guards is seriously wounded and falls from the coach. He revives sufficiently to carry the news of the attack to General Custer, who immediately goes to the rescue of the coach, which he brings safely to the fort, after routing the Indians.

Neesha, hating Wolf Fang, reports to the chief of the tribe, Black Hawk, that Wolf Fang and his gang of renegades attacked the coach, and when Wolf Fang returns to camp he is denounced by Black Hawk. Custer sends Sergeant James to Fort Wallace to report the attack on the stage. Wolf Fang, after being driven from the Indian camp as a renegade, slays Sergeant James on the road. Gertrude and Phyllis leave the fort for a walk and are attacked by Wolf Fang, who throws Gertrude into the river and carries Phyllis away on horseback. Neesha's sweetheart happened to find the body of the slain messenger, Sergeant James, and when Custer and his troops arrive at the scene they believe Swift Foot to be the slayer and arrest him and carry him to the fort.

Gertrude, meanwhile, has spread the alarm about the abduction of Phyllis by Wolf Fang. Captain Clifford mounts a swift steed and, accompanied by Neesha, they set out to capture Wolf Fang and rescue Phyllis. Wolf Fang escapes and incites his renegade band of Sioux to attack an ammunition train, which is being guarded by Custer, Clifford and other soldiers. The Indians make so vigorous an attack that Custer desires more soldiers in defense and Clifford volunteers to ride to the fort and bring additional troopers. Custer, knowing that the renegade band is waiting for darkness to renew the attack on the ammunition train, decides upon a clever ruse to rout them. Custer has a mule-driver lash his team, hauling a load of gunpowder, with a lighted fuse, into the camp of the Indians. The latter run to take possession of the wagon, when it explodes, killing many of the renegades. Clifford arrives with a band of cavalrymen and the Indians are routed.

Swift Foot, who has been released from custody, and Wolf Fang, at the close of the fight meet in combat, and Swift Foot slays his rival. During their acquaintance at the fort, Clifford and Phyllis have fallen in love and the final scenes show the happiness of these two lovers and also the joy of the Indian sweethearts, Neesha and Swift Foot.

SOLDIERS THREE (2 parts—August 16).—Ned, Frank and Bill are friends. There is a call for volunteers for the Civil War. Frank and Bill enlist, but Ned delays, as he is the only support of a sick mother, who has just had a relapse. This is unknown to the villagers and they believe Ned to be a coward. At last the mother improves sufficiently for Ned to enlist. They start for the front, and Dora, the girl that both Ned and Frank love, promises to wed the one who returns with the highest rank. At their first battle, Frank deserts in action, while Ned proves himself a hero by saving the flag and his captain's life, but just as he had gotten the unconscious captain to safety, he faints. Frank sees him from the shelter of a tree and creeps out. He drags Ned back behind the tree and himself picks up the flag and his captain and goes to camp, where he is received as a hero by officers and men alike and promised to be mentioned for promotion, which he later receives. As he turns to go, Bill, who had been hiding behind another tree, confronts him, telling Frank that he had seen all. Bill promises to remain silent if Frank will use his influence for him. This he does and the three boys return home after the war—Frank and Bill with commissions, but Ned still in the ranks.

True to her promise, Dora marries Frank and moves to a nearby town, where, after a year's time she has become thoroughly disillusioned—her fortune nearly all spent and forced to stand both neglect and abuse. She overhears a quarrel between Bill and Frank on account of the former demanding more money and learns that it was Ned who was the real hero. She leaves, to go to a friend in her home town, but Frank overtakes her and drives her to a sanitarium, telling the doctor in charge of the hospital and sanitarium that the death of her father has unbalanced her mind. He then tells Bill that he will not only outfit him for a mining trip, but also accompany him. They set out, but their first night in the desert Frank gets up stealthily, takes the water and supplies and is just riding away to leave Bill to die, when Bill awakens and fires at him. Frank hurries to the hospital, while Ned and his mother, who have sold their cottage and started across the desert to make a new home, hear Bill's cries, go to him and take him to the hospital. Bill and Frank die, after Bill has confessed and Ned and Dora are left to pick up the tangled threads of their romance.

HOW WOMEN LOVE (August 12).—Alice Howard, the daughter of Colonel Howard, a wealthy retired planter, falls in love with Henry Carleton, her music teacher. Henry tells the proud colonel of his love for Alice and is forbidden to enter the house. The young couple elope and are married. They take up housekeeping in the city, and after trying to gain the parental blessing, which is refused, they gradually drift away from Alice's family altogether. Things go fairly well with the young couple for a while, when Carleton is suddenly taken ill and is forced to take to his bed. He continues to be sick until his entire savings have been exhausted. Meanwhile the colonel has his troubles trying to comfort his wife, who grieves over Alice's forced absence from her home. Alice determines to seek employment, so as to earn enough at least to sustain life in Carleton and herself, until such time as her husband recovers from his illness and is able to resume his own work. She walks the streets from one place to another for days at a time, until finally she obtains employment in a sweatshop, sewing garments on a machine. Her hours are tiresome, but she does not mind that so long as she is earning a living for herself and the man she loves. One day the foreman of the shop, attracted by her rare beauty, attempts to kiss her and she slaps his face. She is discharged. She looks for work elsewhere, and the landlady of their flat threatens to dispossess them unless the rent, which is past due, is paid. Carleton, desperate, though still ill, gets out of bed and goes out, trying to find something to do whereby he can earn some money. He is overcome while on the street and a crowd is attracted. Among them is Jackson, the colonel's faithful old colored butler, who was visiting the city with the colonel. He recognizes Carleton and assists him home. He gives the landlady her money; then gets the colonel and brings him to the house. There, the old gentleman, realizing the depth of Alice's love, and what she has gone through, takes them both to his heart and makes them come home with him.

POOR JAKE'S DEMISE (August 16).—Jake surprises his wife and a Willy Mollycoddle making love in his home. He is so enraged at his wife's frailty and Mollycoddle's duplicity, that he promptly throws the latter through the window. Jake rebukes his repentant wife and leaves the house, swearing to commit suicide. The wife, fearing that he may carry out his resolve, telephones to police headquarters. The seargeant gallantly responds to her appeal and sends out his three "trusted" cops in search of Jake. Meanwhile, Jake decides to reflect at the "bar" before his final deed. There he discovers Mollycoddle, who also has sought to drown his sorrows. He is immediately recognized by Jake, who, by the aid of a seltzer bottle, makes things suggestively more pleasant for the ardent lover on the outside than within the jealous husband's range.

Jake, having temporarily prolonged his attempt at suicide, wobbles in an intoxicated condition from the saloon and becomes entangled in a park fountain, where he is set upon by ruffians and relieved of valuables. The police unexpectedly fall upon the unconscious form of Jake and carry him, with ceremony of the dead, to his home, where his wife, grief-stricken at his apparent self-destruction, proceeds to call upon the assistance of Mollycoddle. He willingly assists in the burial of the principal barrier of his heart's desire. During the final preparations of Jake's rather hurried funeral, the mourners are suddenly surprised to find him sitting upright in their midst. Mollycoddle immediately makes a hurried and final exit from the house, as Mr. and Mrs. Schultz, both repentant, go to a fond embrace.

THE GREAT TOWEL ROBBERY (August 15).—A traveling comedy company has finished its engagement in a small country town and is leaving the hotel in an automobile for the next town. After their departure the chambermaid finds several towels missing and informs the proprietor. He telephones the sheriff of the loss, and the latter, accompanied by four deputies, starts in pursuit of the comedy company. The automobile in which the troupe is traveling gets stuck in the country road. The members of the company refuse to walk, and the manager secures the services of a nearby farmer to haul the troupe in his wagon. Arrived at the scene of the accident the company and baggage are loaded into the wagon, but the farmer is so busy watching the soubrette that he upsets the whole troupe in the road and they have to walk to the farm house.

In the meantime, the sheriff, after many mishaps, catches up with the troupe. The deputies are concealed outside the barn while the sheriff goes to the house to reconnoiter. He meets the farmer, who invites him to a drink of hard cider, and in partaking of this seductive fluid, they forget all else. The troupe is being fed in the front yard of the farm, while the farmer's son, a tough kid, is carrying on a flirtation with the soubrette, which leads to many amusing incidents and accidents. At last the sheriff remembers what he was sent for, and calling the waiting deputies, he places the troupe under arrest, while they are still at dinner. The wife of the hotel proprietor comes into the hotel office and is told of the loss of the towels. She demurely produces them from her bustle. The proprietor sends a messenger after the sheriff, and he arrives there just as the arrest is being made. Relieved from suspicion of the robbery, the troupe takes revenge on the sheriff and deputies by pelting them with food.

FATE'S VENGEANCE (August 15).—Through the efforts and sacrifices of Jo, his younger brother, Edward, is sent East to college. Four years later he returns after graduation, a foppish, conceited, good-for-nothing. At the time of his return, Jo has just received a letter from a millionaire cattle king, saying that he and his party will arrive at Jo's ranch to look over his stock with a view to buying it. The party, consisting of the cattle king, his daughter, son and secretary, arrives, and Edward immediately falls in love with the daughter. Jo also falls in love with her, but hides his affection and permits his brother to win the girl. Edward is also pretending to be in love with Wanita, an Indian maid about the ranch.

Some time later Edward and Jane, the cattle king's daughter, are married. A few years elapse before they return to the ranch again. In the meantime, Wanita has borne a son. Upon Edward's return for a visit to the ranch, Wanita tells her brother of her wrong and asks vengeance upon Edward. The brother asks Edward his intentions, and he tells him that he only married Jane for her money, and intimates that if she were out of the way he would marry Wanita. The brother decides to put Jane out of the way.

Jane, through saving the life of Wanita's child, wins her gratitude and when the brother enters the house she stops him until Jane has left. He, however, breaks away and follows Jane. Wanita tells Jo of the plot against Jane and Jo goes to the rescue. He arrives just in time to save her and bring her back to the house. On their arrival there, Edward's duplicity is revealed, and after some trouble with Jo, he is ordered out. Wanita's brother arrives at the window at the moment Edward is passing from the room, fires through the window and kills him. Jane's sympathy turns to Jo.

THE HEART OF A JEWESS (2 parts—August 15).—Abraham Lieberman is a coal and ice dealer on the lower East Side, his little business being conducted in a miserable basement—his living rooms being adjacent thereto. But Abraham is happy withal, for his daughter, Rebecca, has come to him from Russia. A month later Rebecca is working in a sweat shop to help keep their little home. There she meets David Cohen, foreman of the place, who falls in love with her. But she tells him he has no chance to win her heart, as it is held in keeping across the seas. A month later her sweetheart arrives from Russia, and David leaves New York. Meanwhile, Jake has become Americanized and desires to take up the study of medicine, but has not sufficient means to enter college. Rebecca comes to his aid, and her little savings enable him to take up his course. In due time he graduates and he hangs up his "shingle," but his patients are poor and so his living is precarious. At this juncture, along comes a Schatchen, a Jewish matchmaker, and offers to get him a rich wife. The girl in question is very homely, but her rich surroundings dazzle Jake and he succumbs. Thus is Rebecca thrown over for Mammon.

A few months later the "happy" bridal pair and their friends start for the synagogue. On the way their machine runs down a poor girl who has just come from a drug store with medicine for her sick father. The girl is Rebecca. She is taken to the hospital, where, in deep repentance, her recalcitrant lover begs her forgiveness. In the synagogue, meanwhile, the homely bride awaits the coming of Jake; but her father rushes in and tells of his base desertion.

Back at the hospital, Rebecca, regaining consciousness, repudiates Jake and tells him to go to his waiting bride. Paying the penalty of his transgression, he dejectedly goes forth, but deeper humiliation is to follow. Arriving at the synagogue, he is met by an infuriated woman, who spurns him and casts him off, leaving him to the mercy of her friends, who beat and maltreat him, as he well deserves. Months later, David, the foreman, returns, and learning of Rebecca's dilemma, seeks her out and again pleads for her love. Rebecca accepts him and happiness at last comes to the Jewish girl.

FRONTIER.

THE SUFFRAGETTE TAMES THE BANDIT (August 14).—Lord Wilbur Castlebroke has two great troubles—his sister, Lady Ethel Mary Castlebroke, a suffragette leader, and his lack of ready cash. While at his ranch he gets word, through the newspapers, that his sister has been arrested for causing a riot in the streets of an eastern city. Shortly thereafter he receives word from the lady herself, that she is coming to visit him at the end of her incarceration.

About this time a reward is offered for the arrest of Bill Williams, a bandit king. In searching for him the sheriff has occasion to visit Lord Castlebroke's ranch. In fact, they only precede Lady Ethel by a few minutes. Lady Ethel begins the promulgation of her principles immediately on arrival at the ranch. One of the things which brings great disgust to Lord Wilbur is the campaign for suffrage which she inaugurates in the streets of the little town near the ranch. She takes Lord Castlebroke into this scheme and thereby causes her easy-going spouse some inconvenience. When the sheriff and his deputies attempt to clear the streets the newly converted suffragists maltreat the poor officer so that he goes to Lord Wilbur for aid.

Assistance and relief are forthcoming from an unexpected quarter, however, for Bill Williams learns that Lady Ethel Mary is an heiress as well as a suffragist. With the aid of his bold, bad men he kidnaps her. To his surprise, she immediately converts his mother, an attache of the bandit camp, to the plan of women's rights. A further surprise is his when Lord Wilbur not only refuses to ransom his sister, but actually threatens Bill with arrest in case she should be returned. As he pays $5,000, the amount demanded for her retention, Bill agrees to this plan. Lady Ethel causes a revolution in the routine of the bandit camp. Bill grows desperate and offers to return Lady Ethel and the $5,000 together. Lord Wilbur resists these advances and threatens Bill's immediate arrest unless he retains Lady Ethel. But he guesses that Bill will choose jail to further tortures at the hands of Lady Ethel, so he sends for the sheriff and a justice of the peace. Bill's messenger to Lord Wilbur returns just in time to find the bloody bandit sewing circle in full swing under the personal direction of Lady Ethel Mary. William determines that jail cannot be so very much worse than what he is then enduring anyway, and back he and his comrades take the heiress. At the door of the ranch house Lord Wilbur forces Bill to choose between the bonds of matrimony and those of the sheriff, with the result that Bill decides on marriage on the ground that maybe marrying an heiress will not be so bad after all.

THE RETRIBUTION OF YSOBEL (August 16).—Baldwin, a hot-headed youngster, loves Ethel a great deal. When at last she allows him to place a ring upon her finger, he is very proud. His pride is touched though by the fact that the ring is a little too large, and he offers to take it to a jeweler to have it cut down, but Ethel wants to show it to her friends at the party that evening, and she keeps it on.

Not long after Baldwin has gone to his home, Ethel's cousin, a merry and good-hearted chap, returns from a trip abroad. As he leaves the house to go downtown and meet his friends once more, Ethel rushes out to tell him goodbye. In the hearty handshake that follows, Ethel's ring is drawn off accidentally. The cousin urges that she let him take it down to the jeweler and get it fixed. After some urging Ethel agrees, but to get the right size she tries on one of the cousin's rings. One is found after several trials, that is the right size and he leaves, agreeing to have it made that dimension.

That night at the party, the cousin returns Ethel's own ring, but it is not quite right yet. She again tries on his ring, and while she is doing it he improves the opportunity to steal a kiss. Baldwin sees them and so great is his anger that explanations can do no good when he finds the cousin's ring where his own ought to be. His faith in woman-kind is crushed and he leaves that place forever.

In due time he arrives in the West, buys a horse and saddle and gets work on a ranch. The ranch owner, a woman, is responsible for his employment and this gains him the enmity of the ranch foreman, a Mexican named Gonzales. Later Baldwin protects a girl from abuse at the hands of Gonzales. The ranch owner discharges the Mexican, and six months later gives the place to Baldwin, who by this time has fallen a victim to the coquettish wiles of Ysobel.

As she is returning from a trip to California, Ethel gets off the train at a little wayside station. Because she wants to be alone, she orders her maid to remain at the train. A sprained ankle, subsequent fainting spell, and a supply wagon from the ranch ultimately bring her to the place over which Baldwin presides. Meanwhile, Baldwin has been trying his best to forget the East, an effort in which he is aided by his wife, Ysobel. Ethel is shocked when she finds Baldwin married, but there is no way in which she can leave the ranch that day and she stays perforce. Gonzales, the discharged foreman, sneaks back and leaves a note for Ysobel, warning her as she values her secret, to be at the shelter on the range that night. The ranch woman takes Ethel out on the range for a drive, and when she becomes tired, leaves her in Baldwin's care. Baldwin leaves her at the shelter with his revolver, telling her that a shot will recall him should he be needed. Ethel becomes worried and leaves the shelter. Gonzales and Ysobel make tryst there, and Ysobel, at harsh words from Gonzales, shoots him. The shot recalls both Ethel and Baldwin. The girl, thoroughly frightened, fires again. She turns and as Baldwin enters, he finds her standing over the body of Gonzales, which she has just discovered. Thinking she has killed the man, he confesses to the cowboys on their arrival, that he is the guilty party. Next morning everyone urges him to go away before the sheriff comes, but he will not. The officer is about to make his arrest when an Indian arrives with news that puts a different complexion on things. This Indian has observed the quarrel of the night before and when Gonzales lies dying, stole from him the papers about which he was talking to Ysobel a moment before. He has been to a priest and had them translated and he bears word to the tragic little party at the ranch that Ysobel not only killed Gonzales at the shelter, but that she was his wife at the time. A certificate from the priest bears witness to this fact. The way is thus cleared for Baldwin to rectify his former mistake and attain happiness, while Ysobel has at last come upon the retribution of her coquettishness.

DARKFEATHER'S SACRIFICE (August 11).—Darkfeather graduates from Hopi. She returns to her tribe, met by her father, Ungatah, wearing the latest modern clothes. Kotah, an old admirer, shows his dislike for modern ideas by presenting her with a beautiful beaded leather dress. She assumes the garb of her tribe and again rides the prairies and forests. Ned, a surveyor, rides from his camp one day and becomes lost in the desert. He is forced to abandon his dead horse, and is rescued from death by thirst by Darkfeather. She takes him to the village and nurses him to health. While drifting in a canoe one day, during his convalescence, he tells her of his love. She accepts it, and on the bank he cuts two hearts in the bark of an old tree and carves their initials under them. Returning to the village, he openly declares his love for her by placing an engagement ring on her finger before the Indians. Later he leaves, promising to return. Kotah distrusts Ned, but says nothing.

Darkfeather, roaming over the old places, waits his coming, but when mail is brought to the camp and none for her, she becomes doubtful. Later, a party of surveyors pass through the village and stop to buy feed. Darkfeather questions Jim about Ned. He tells her Ned is married and shows her a newspaper containing a notice thereof. Darkfeather, filled with anger and jealousy, at once assumes her civilian clothes and goes to the city, learning Ned's whereabouts through an old envelope he left in a discarded jacket. She finds Ned and his wife in the garden of their palatial home, and decides to strike them down; but love conquers her jealousy and she leaves quietly.

Returning to the village, she discards her civilian dress and carries all relics of civilization in a bundle to the trysting tree of the hearts and initials. Here she casts the bundle of clothing into a huge fire, which consumes them as well as the tree.

JUANITA (August 13).—In the land of the setting sun there lived an old Castilian and his only daughter of five years. Grieved by the death of his loving wife, old Pedro habitually visited her grave. At the opening of the story we find him at her grave, accompanied by his little daughter. In a nearby valley an Indian chief with braves, having paused to water their horses, hear the sweet, clear notes of the child lifted in song. The

Better Light for Your Machine

An arc lamp using direct current from a G-E Rectifier gives the finest light that can be obtained. The light is powerful and does not flicker like the light of an alternating current arc.

The G-E Rectifier not only improves the quality of the light, but at the same time it reduces the cost for current, because the rectifier furnishes current at the exact voltage needed by the lamp. Losses in rheostats are therefore entirely eliminated.

old chief is moved by its charm and dispatches his braves to bring the child to him. In the execution of his orders old Pedro is felled by a blow on the head in his vain effort to shield his child, and left unconscious, while little Juanita is carried over the trail to the tepee of their chief, who adopts her as his own. Her father, whose mind becomes affected as a result of the blow and loss of his child, goes wanderingly off.

Twelve years pass by. His daughter has grown to girlhood under the care of the old chief. One day a visiting tribe happens upon the scene and their chief becomes attracted by Juanita's unusual beauty. A bargain is struck and the old chief turns his charge over to the visiting tribe, with whom she departs upon the back of the chief's mustang. That eve, Juanita, rebellious at her new master's brutal wooing, drives his knife into his side and flees in terror from the sleeping camp. In her blinded flight she chances upon a notorious band of cattle rustlers operating under the leadership of Kid Romaro. She is immediately seized and made captive.

Edwin West, a young deputy, dispatched to locate, if possible, the whereabouts of the outlaws, is staid suddenly in his lone trail by Juanita's cry of distress, and pushes his horse ahead to investigate. He located the camp in time to witness a knife struggle in progress to decide a claim as to who shall claim the captive. Through strategy the young deputy succeeds in rescuing Juanita and carries her to the sheriff's home. Romaro, upon visiting the settlement, is detected by Juanita, who hurriedly notifies the young deputy. A strong scene is enacted in which West, in an effort to arrest Romaro, is wounded by the bandit. During the action Juanita simultaneously draws a gun from the holster of a nearby puncher and mortally shoots the outlaw.

A few days later, Juanita, while in the garden of her benefactors, is attracted by the faint and familiar notes of old Pedro's flute. As she nears the old musician, the old love song comes back to her and she unconsciously bursts forth in song. Her father, upon hearing her voice lifted as of old in melody, gathers her in his arms in full restoration of reason.

The sheriff, in the meantime, having received a check payable to bearer in accordance with previous reward posted for Romaro, dead or alive, has turned it over to the young deputy, who hurriedly leaves to appear upon the closing scene with Juanita and her father. He presses the check into her hand.

HAWKEYE TO THE RESCUE (August 15).—Portuguese Joe and his band of smugglers have kept the port police boat and its captain, Jack Edwards, busy for months. Ramona, the beautiful sweetheart of Jack, is made love to by Joe, and repulses him with scorn. He forcibly seizes her and is about to kiss her, when Jack rushes upon him and knocks him down. Joe goes back to his crew, cursing Jack and swearing vengeance. Ramona, going out to set her nets, is seen by the smugglers, and in their launch they chase and overtake her. They drag her aboard their boat and her own boat drifts back to shore. There Jack finds it, and a bandana, which was torn from one of the smugglers.

Knowing her to be in their power, Jack essays to rescue her with his police, but the smugglers outnumber him and he is forced to retire. Jack decides now that there is but one person who can rescue Ramona—Hawkeye, the great detective. Jack appeals to him to come and rescue the girl, and he consents. Hawkeye and his men miss their train, but, undaunted, they seize a section boss's hand car and pump madly to the rescue. Meanwhile, Ramona is tied in the smugglers' cabin and told by Portuguese Joe that death or her promise of marriage lies before her. The brave girl, true to her officer lover, scorns him. Hawkeye arrives, and with his two brave officers, Jack and his crew, they embark in the police boat to find the smugglers. Portuguese Joe is about to blow the lovely Ramona skyward, when one of his lawless followers dashes in with the awful information that "Hawkeye is on our trail." Terror strikes the smugglers, and they decide to flee. Dragging Ramona to their boat, they put to sea. Hawkeye sees them embark, and urging the police boat to full speed, they run down the smugglers' boat, capture Portuguese Joe, and the officer and his sweetheart are reunited.

SALLY SCRAGGS, HOUSEMAID (August 14).—Doris Lowrey, a famous novelist, in order to get material for her new novel—"Sally Scraggs, Housemaid," leaves her home of luxury and, impersonating a housemaid, seeks and secures a position as such in a typical boarding house. Her desire to discover "characters" meets with instant success. Part of her arduous duties is to wait on table, where congregate a varied assortment of boarders. Possessing a pretty face and an attractive personality, she is made the recipient of bold advances on the part of a young clerk. Frank Norcross, a poor, struggling author, gallantly protects her. Doris is astonished to discover while cleaning Frank's room, that he, too, is a novelist. His finished novel is submitted to one of the foremost publishing houses. And then comes a letter not only telling of acceptances but advancing royalties. Norcross is in a predicament on account of his shoes being worn past repair, and it is Doris who prevails upon him to accept as a loan one of her rings which is to be pawned for sufficient money to purchase a new pair. Elated with his unlooked for success, Norcross forgets for the moment the apparently poor girl who has been so much to him. The months slip by and Norcross is being dined and feted by the elite, while the girl, hurt by his neglect, throws aside her desire to further seek characters, and returns home where she finishes her novel, which strange to say meets with equal success.

Norcross, in going over his papers, discovers a valentine that the housemaid had given him, inside also being the long forgotten pawn ticket. His neglect and ingratitude cause to burst into flame the tender sentiment of his struggling days. He searches days and days to discover her whereabouts. His "Personal" is seen in the paper by "the Girl" wherein he asks that she communicate with him. She phones him and makes an appointment.

Norcross keeps the appointment and meets her, she having hunted up the old dress to make him think she occupies the same position as when he knew her. He shows his sincerity of purpose, as he returns the ring and asks for her hand. She pretends anger and dismisses him. She, meanwhile, discards the old dress, and, gowned in stylish garments, hastens to his home. Her card is given to the disconsolate Norcross. She has followed the valet, however, and sees him tear the card and refuse to see her. The valet is enjoined to remain silent; then "Sally Scraggs" steals up to Norcross, silently slips into his view the title page of her own book, and stands waiting. Dazed momentarily by the revelation of her true identity and the realization that she has come in answer to his most sincere desire, he staggers to his feet. And the time of lingering doubt ends.

THE ANIMAL (August 17).—Reid, "The Animal," a man of great strength and brutal impulse, arouses a certain admiration within Miss Bush, who at a distance, has witnessed his fearless battle with an opponent of unusual proportional advantages. Neilan, her escort, a young man of more sensitive nature, is repulsed by the struggle and turns away with the girl, who reluctantly follows. They are later overtaken by Reid, who has previously made overtures to Miss Bush. He puts her escort to flight and gathers her unwillingly in his firm embrace. She gradually yields to his command and consents to be his wife.

Another contrast of extreme nature is effected through the gentl wooing of Toodles by her lover, which also gives way to marriage. A year elapses and a child is born unto Toddles. The loving couple fondle their own, but for a short time, before Heaven recalls it and they are left to mourn its death. In the rude hut of the forceful Reid and submissive wife an infant opens its eyes for the first time upon the world. Reid, who is attracted by the excitement in his home, endeavors to enter but is denied admission by the nurse, and he moodily wanders away in thought until at last his gaze is attracted by the simple grave in which Toddles and her husband's joys and hopes are slumbering. He halts and from a distance watches the parents' grief, unmoved through lack of apprehension.

Upon his return, cheers greet him at a passing tavern as father of a son. He is sullen and dull in understanding; stares perplexedly and goes his way moodily. At his home he is confronted by his own offspring and looks blindly for the cause of the mother love which is now centered upon her nursing child. A fit of jealously is aroused within him and his first impulse is to kill the helpless infant which threatens to spring between them. He pauses to reflect and moodily wanders off, to pause again near the grave to watch the silent prayers of the grief-stricken parents. A sudden thought finds expression within his brutal nature and he slowly retraces his steps. At the cradle of the child he pauses to gather his tiny offspring in his arms and stealthily goes forth to the home of the mournful parents and places it in the arms of Toddles, who fondles it dearly to her breast in hysterical joy, as Reid silently takes his leave.

Upon his return he finds his wife in an insane frenzy at the loss of her child. He regards her in bewilderment, firmly denying any knowledge of their child. A search is made by sympathetic neighbors of the woods and vicinity but to no avail, while the wife hysterically nurses the empty blanket to her breast, calling for her child. Neilan, her old sweetheart, whose unspoken love has never failed, pleads with the husband to find the child and restore the mother's reason. The husband, at last moved by Neilan's argument, goes to the home of Toddles and forcibly takes his child from her clinging arms and restores it to his grief-stricken wife.

THE THIRST FOR GOLD (2 parts—August 13).—The action of this story takes place during the Civil War period. Fredericks, an army surgeon, was detailed to the Suffolk Penitentiary. On being invited by Surgeon Cadwalader, a young comrade, to attend the Governor's ball, Fredericks upbraided him bitterly, saying that his poverty barely left him apparel for ordinary occasions. In a nearby field, Helen, and her sweetheart, George, were helping the Widow Drury to spread her linen for bleaching when Helen slipped and sprained an ankle. George ran for assistance and encountered Surgeon Fredericks on horseback. The surgeon directed George to carry Helen home, and he followed in surly fashion. He would not treat the girl until her mother had parted with gold—a locket and chain—in payment.

That night while Surgeon Fredericks slept drunkenly the Sisters of Mercy in the prison saw Convict 220 faint for lack of medical aid. Fredericks finally roused himself, pronounced the man dead and ordered him removed to the dissecting room. In a brutal mood he prepared for immediate work on the corpse, and was about to plunge his knife into it when the corpse rose up, threw back his arms and bespoke his protection—for a price. When Surgeon Fredericks had recovered his composure, he learned that Convict 220 had feigned death in order to attempt escape for the purpose of recovering the stolen wealth which had caused his imprisonment. The plan to its hiding place was tattooed on 220's arm, and he was willing to share the booty with the surgeon if he would aid him to escape. Fredericks agreed. Shortly after dawn they had reached a point where the prisoner would have to be lowered by a rope. Fredericks waited until the man was within a hundred feet of the river below; then one blow of his axe severed the stout rope and sent his victim hurling into the water. Fredericks then turned back toward the penitentiary. To escape before official inquiry should disclose Convict 220's disappearance he wrote himself a letter supposedly received from a defunct uncle in which he was named as the heir to comfortable estates. Armed with this, he appeared before the colonel in command only to learn that he was charged with mistaking catalepsy for death, thereby enabling a prisoner to escape; for which he was sentenced to a month's imprisonment.

Convict 220 had not been drowned, for George Trueworth, rowing across the river had rescued him and had taken him to the Widow Drury's home, that she might aid the poor wretch. One month later, Fredericks was freed, and, upon unanimous vote during a session of court martial, dishonorably discharged. He left early.

After some search, he located the place, and his feverish digging uncovered the box Convict 220 had described. Convict 220, recovered after a month of faithful nursing, had also come in search of his wealth, wherewith to reward the widow and her family. As the convict faced the man who attempted his murder, Fredericks reeled, then attacked the phantom with his axe, felling it. Fredericks aimed a blow at the box, when Convict 220 begged him to hold back a moment. Fredericks struck him again, struck the box a heavy blow, and fell across his victim, a victim to the explosive which Convict 220 had placed in the box to defeat other finders than himself.

Helen and George heard the explosion and came to learn its cause. They found the two men covered with a shroud of gold. George buried them and carried the gold home to the widow. She would not touch it until George showed her the letter it contained, giving it to the first honest people who might discover it.

homestead involved had been passed from father to son and was about to be wrested from them by an avaricious corporation. Lawsuits were started, but the corporation managed to gain the best of the argument, when Ruth took the law into her own hands, held up the coach, and stored the big strong box in the bushes. Notices offering big rewards were posted conspicuously and Ruth lost her fortitude. The reward was increased, Ruth disclosed the location of the treasure, but refused the reward. The company's agent lost his nerve, and as appreciation, deeded back the old homestead to Ruth. The glory and reward went to Ruth, but was enjoyed by her lover, Joe, who as her confederate, had aided in the hold-up.

THE DOCTOR'S DILEMMA (August 4).—Old man Harvey has always distrusted banks and kept his money in a secret drawer in the house, but when he gets ill he mistrusts everyone about him, and begs Dr. Reed, who is attending him, to place the money in a safe deposit vault. The doctor promises to do so, but arrives at the bank too late, so has to take the money home with him. He explains to his wife and little girl, Ruth. Two tramps about to beg for food peer in at the window and see him place the money in a desk. They decide to wait until the doctor leaves the house again, then to steal the money. Old man Hervey gets a relapse and the doctor gets an urgent call to come at once. After he has gone the tramps force their way into the house. Mrs. Reed and Ruth go into the doctor's office and barricade the door; then calls up her husband. He manages to get part of the message and understands her danger, but his patient's life is at stake and he cannot leave him. Meanwhile, the tramps have forced in the door. Mrs. Reed gets an idea, and, putting Ruth through the window with the money, tells her to go for help. She is unable to escape as the tramps seize her and threaten her while they search for the money. Ruth finds help and the rescuing party soon arrives. The doctor has restored his patient, and as the immediate danger is past he hastens home, arriving just in time to help subdue the tramps.

THE SILLY SEX (August 6).—Elaine, a well-known lecturer, hates men. John, who has written a book called "Women the Silly Sex," cannot bear the sight of a woman, and to avoid them all in general, he arranges for the purchase of a deserted island where he will be able to write in peace. Elaine goes to the home of a friend in the country, near John's island. One day, out on the lake, she starts to rehearse her speech with such feeling that she falls overboard. She swims ashore and there finds John's clothes, he having gone in for a swim. She hurriedly changes her dripping riding habit for his things. Seeing him coming out of the water, she runs up the path. He finds the wet suit and thinks some boy took his clothes. He races after Elaine, and catching up with her grabs her by the collar and announces his intention of thrashing "the boy." But luckily her cap comes off and he sees that it is a woman who has invaded his island. She calls him a brute and tells him she wants to get back to the mainland. He suggests she wait in his cabin until a boat passes. An hour goes by and Elaine commences to feel hungry. She summons John and tells him that she is hungry. He points to the icebox and bids her cook what she wishes. She is furious at the idea, but later hunger gets the better of her pride and she manages to prepare lunch. Five o'clock arrives. She tells John that he will have to swim to the mainland for a boat. He cannot swim well and is not anxious to take a chance. She insists. He finally goes, and as she sees him dive into the sea she gets frightened and begs him to come back. But he does not listen. He encounters a rowboat with Elaine's friend and a couple of fishermen looking for the missing girl. He takes them to the island and Elaine is taken aboard; but not before she has shaken hands cordially with the woman hater, who finds himself wishing that he might see her again. In the pocket of her riding suit he later finds her card and calls upon her. They become great friends and a double conversion is affected when he persuades her to burn her lecture with a copy of his book.

THE FIGHT FOR RIGHT (2 parts—August 9).—John Ward, a young workman, loves Mary Durlan, daughter of a rich politician, who installs prison contract labor in the prisons of his city. The other knitting mills in the town cannot compete with cheap prison labor and are forced to close down. John and his brother, Joe, are thrown out of work and with others of the men, go to see Durland, who refuses to listen to them. John and Joe vainly look for work. Their mother is ill and needs nourishing food and medicine, and they have no money. Joe, an impulsive, warm-hearted lad, decides that as Durland took their living away, he shall pay, and he goes to his office intending to rob it of enough to carry his mother through her illness. Durland returns for some papers and the boy is caught. He is sent to prison and works on the knitting machines. He breaks down under the strain, is brutally treated by the guards and is later transferred to the road making gang. Unaccustomed to this he faints continually, but never meets the slightest kindness or consideration. Mary Durland returns home from boarding school and meets John, who is now a mechanic. She sees the difference in him and asks what is wrong. He does not tell her the truth, not wishing her to know her father is the cause of his trouble. John becomes a labor leader and makes up his mind to fight the prison contract labor system. Mary, who has become interested in sociological work, discovers the truth about the prisons when she finds Joe, physically and almost mentally a wreck. To convince herself further she goes through the prisons as well as the hospitals. She goes up North and studies prison conditions there. She finds men learning trades and working for the state, not in competition with labor. Returning home she calls on John to come and see her, and to him she tells what she saw while away, announcing her intention of fighting the prison contract system. John then tells her she will be fighting her own father, but nothing daunted, she goes right ahead. Mary and John appear before the legislature just as a bill is about to be refused prohibiting prison labor. They have Joe with them, helpless and almost a cripple, and Mary makes an impassioned speech recommending the bill. She so interests the men that they rise and one and all vote for the bill. Durland, feeling himself beaten, consents to his daughter's marriage with John.

THE FLAME IN THE ASHES (2 parts—August 15).—Capt. Wilton has long been a prey to drink. His wife left him shortly after the birth of their child, Betty, owing to his inability to conquer the habit. Col. Hamilton, who has known Wilton from boyhood, has endeavored to bring about a reconciliation, but Wilton's failure to keep sober has prevented this.

Rosa, a beautiful half-breed Mexican woman, has a barroom. Soldiers from the barracks frequent the place, and one day a terrible fight takes place, which is stopped by Capt. Wilton. Col. Hamilton issues an order prohibiting soldiers from frequenting the place, and Rosa and her lover, Yuma, plan to ensnare Wilton in order to secure his intervention with the Colonel. Rosa uses all her wiles on Wilton, and he finally succumbs and drinks with her.

This takes place after Wilton has faithfully promised Hamilton never to drink again, and after the first drink he loses his sense of reasoning and becomes intoxicated. The Colonel finds him in this condition and takes him home, and then issues an order to Rosa to close her place.

Mrs. Wilton dies suddenly, and the Captain receives a letter from his little daughter that she is coming to join him. With nerves unstrung from his spree, he realizes that he is not fit to raise the child, and he resolves to ask the Colonel to adopt her, as Hamilton and his wife have recently lost a girl of about his daughter's age. He plans to disappear and have his daughter informed that he has died. His letter with this proposition reaches the Colonel as a court martial is about to be held to try Wilton, and the officers accept the way out of an unpleasant dilemma.

The little girl arrives; Wilton disappears and never communicates with any one at the fort. Betty grows into a beautiful young woman and becomes engaged to Col. Andre. Yuma marries Rosa, and they have a saloon many miles away. Wilton, a physical wreck from dissipation, gray and bent, is not recognizable. In his wanderings he reaches Rosa's saloon, and is engaged as a porter.

Col. Hamilton and his adopted daughter, Betty, go on a visit to a neighboring fort, and pass the saloon of Rosa, accompanied by an escort of cavalry. Rosa and Yuma recognize the Colonel and plan revenge, arranging with their Indian friends to attack them. A sensational fight takes place, during which Yuma carries Betty from the stage coach to the saloon. The Indians are defeated, and that night, in a sullen mood, the chief calls on Yuma and demands Betty. The old porter—Wilton—is given no attention, and he overhears the plot. He goes into the cellar for more whisky, and discovers several kegs of gun powder. The flame of manhood in the ashes of his worthless life flares up, and he decides to save his daughter. He places the piece of candle on top of the barrel of powder so that when it burns down it will cause an explosion, and then manages to reach the room where Betty is bound. He releases her and drops her from the window, and she runs away for help, meeting the surviving soldiers after the battle. As they rush back the kegs of powder explode, blowing the shack to pieces, and hurling the inmates to death. Wilton is still alive when found, and as he dies he whispers to Col. Hamilton his identity, with the request that his daughter shall not be told.

BRONCHO.

THE QUAKERESS (2 parts—August 13).—Priscilla is a Quakeress, living with her invalid mother. The Rev. Cole is in love with her, but she turns a deaf ear to his protestations of affection. John Hart, the new schoolmaster, arrives, and boards with Priscilla's mother. John and Priscilla fall in love with each other, and their engagement to wed is hastened by the death of the mother, who, with her dying breath, asks John to watch over Priscilla.

The minister has "blue laws" passed, among them being one providing that every one must attend church on the Sabbath. Priscilla refuses to comply with the new law and is arrested by a mob, ducked in the river on a ducking stool, and pilloried. She is held for trial and John is among the jury. He holds out for acquittal, though severely menaced by his fellow jurors. Priscilla is then ordered banished from the colony.

John joins her, and they determine to make their way to the Quaker colony in Pennsylvania. They meet Indians on the warpath, and are attacked, and John is badly wounded. He shoots an Indian and gets his canoe. Priscilla, forgiving the wrongs against her by the Puritans, wishes to warn them of the impending attack. John's wounded leg prevents his returning with her, so Priscilla goes alone and John follows in the canoe via the longer river route.

It is the Sabbath, and the Puritans are on their way to church when Priscilla arrives, fainting from exhaustion. She gasps out her story, and immediate arrangements are made for battle. The redskins are given a warm reception, and are finally driven off after a sensational battle. The Rev. Cole is shot, and before expiring pleads for Priscilla's forgiveness, which is freely granted. The grateful people, ashamed of their treatment of Priscilla, try to make amends by showering her with kindness.

A HAIR RAISING AFFAIR (July 29).—We find Simon has set up as a pyrotechnic expert, fireworks have become a profession with him, and his business has far-reaching ramifications, his fame extending even to the wild prairielands of Mexico. His services are requested by the Senor Juan Olivetto. Simon promptly cables an acceptance of the commission, and in the next scene we find his at Olivetto's hacienda in Sao Paulo Rio, Mexico. His ludicrous adventures embrace flirting with the niece of Senior Juan Olivetto, being chased by her irate fiancé, undergoing the torture of scalping by the Oilyfeet Indians (who describe themselves as "Scalp Specialists & Hair Raisers"), being slung on a pole and slowly roasted and basted over a large fire, culminating in his giving a "free pyrotechnic display," in the course of which he entirely exterminates the noxious and cannibalistic Oilyfeet. An epilogue shows us Simple Simon and Senora Dolores as man and wife contemplating their very own tribe of "Tenderfeet," which they have themselves raised.

IN THE LAND OF DATES (July 31).—This film transports the spectator to one of the date-palm districts of upper Egypt—the Oasis of Belad-el-Djerid. We are shown the date-palms growing amid luxurious tropical surroundings. The method of gathering the fruit by natives situated in relays all down the trunk of the tree, is quite instructive—the top man hacks off a bunch of dates and hands it down to the next man, who swiftly passes it on to a third man. And so it travels rapidly earthward, until reaching the ground, it is handed to a "runner," who conveys it to the packing department. The dates are packed on the spot and shipped away in cars from the Oasis.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.

A RESOURCEFUL LOTHARIO (July 31).—Our "masher" friend Gerald King, who imagines himself to be such a lady-killer, is a brisk little man, a keen admirer of feminine beauty, and somewhat irrepressible. Strolling around the stores section of the city, he observes two pretty actresses discussing a stylish hat in the window of a millinery store. His attempts to enter into conversation are very amusing. Subsequently the two ladies separate, and Gerald follows the prettier one. Unaffected by her snubs, he persists until she reaches home. He is told more than once that she is married, but even the servant fails to persuade him to go away, and sheer audacity finally brings him face to face with the lady. After such perseverance Gerald no doubt thinks he is entitled to a smile, but not a bit of it. A sudden step on the stair causes the lady's face to blanch with fear. Her husband has just entered the flat, and she hastens to inform Gerald that he has a fiery temper. Our "masher" is somewhat disturbed at the prospect of a scene, but a ready wit comes to his rescue. Seizing a large pot of roses from a stand he dashes it to the ground, batters his silk hat and damages his coat. He decorates the hat with a couple of roses and twines a stem of them about his neck. When the husband appears, he perceives an angry, flustered little man, who greets him thus: "Ah, there you are, sir! Do you know that one of your goldurned flower pots fell on my head just now as I was passing under your window?" Apparently the husband doesn't, and hastens to pacify the victim as he begins to talk about damages. He offers his own coat and hat in exchange for Gerald's damaged articles. He is even persuaded by the threatening attitude of that practical joker to offer a fifty-dollar bill, which is grudgingly accepted, Gerald ultimately takes his leave in a hat and coat several sizes too small.

The next day a man arrives with a box containing the hat which had been so much admired by the two actresses when Gerald saw them looking into the milliner's window. It is accompanied by a card, on which our hero begs to present his excuses, and states that the hat has been paid for with her husband's cash.

MONEY'S MERCILESS MIGHT (3 parts—Feature Release).—The first part shows us the happy home of a prosperous American broker, Julius P. Leclere. His daughter, Suzanne, is possessed of rare beauty and charm, and it remains for a daring young French aviator to capture the heart of the charming young girl. It is a case of love at first sight when the two meet on the aviation field close to New York City. But Serge Renot, although a capable and daring flying-man, proves to be unsound in his ideas of business morality, and moreover is not blessed with a goodly store of wealth by any means. This information is ferreted out by the powerful capitalist, William Runciman, who desires nothing so much as an alliance with the fair daughter of his friend Leclere. Runciman and Leclere visit Renot's club and discover the young man gambling heavily, and Leclere is strengthened in his determination to put a stop to Renot's suit. But the broker has not seen the storm gathering around him—his speculations fail one after another, his Liberian stock drops to zero, other stocks fall to vanishing point, and Leclere wilts under the crushing blow. Seized with sudden heart failure the broker expires.

Suzanne realizes that union with a penniless aviator is impossible in their present straitened circumstances, and that the only way that she and her mother can continue to live in comfort is for the daughter to make a rich alliance. So with sadly diminished income they resolve to spend one more season in Europe, and depart for the sunny lands of the Riviera. Serge Renot returns to his beloved Paris.

At Cannes Suzanne is introduced to a French lieutenant named de Vergne, the eldest son of a wealthy countess, and the officer promptly falls head over heels in love with the beautiful American girl. Suzanne likes him sufficiently to promise to become his wife. But here upon the scene appears William Runciman, whose chief creed is that his money can procure anything he may want. Runciman invites Renot to Cannes and shows him Suzanne and de Vergne returning from a ride in the woods. Renot is furiously mad, and with jealous rage he challenges the army man to a duel. Next morning we see this duel take place, and de Vernge is badly wounded. Renot calls on the Lecleres, but Runciman has forestalled him. Suzanne tells the aviator that she can never forgive him, and that her former love has turned to hatred. She rushes to the house where Countess de Vergne and her son reside, only to learn that her fiancé and his mother have departed.

A few days later Serge Renot writes a pathetic note to Suzanne appealing once more to her love, and stating that unless she will relent from her present attitude, he has resolved to commit suicide in a dramatic manner while in the air. At this proof of his devotion Suzanne does relent, and hurries off to the aviation ground to prevent Serge carrying out his intention. But she gets there too late. Renot has started. We see his aeroplane sailing through the cerulean blue of the Southern skies like a swallow on the wing, when—the explosion takes place, and the aviator falls to the ground, crushed to death beneath the wreck of his machine.

A month elapses. Suzanne and her mother are back in the New York house, but it is a sad homecoming. The sheriffs have been busy and everything of value bears a justices' seal upon it. Poor distracted Suzanne knows not what to do. At one time she contemplates a speedy release from earthly troubles, but the thought of her helpless mother being left alone to battle with the world deters her. And then she makes the supreme sacrifice. William Runciman has told her that when all esle fails, when her friends have all deserted her, when everything looks black, all she has to do is to send him the single word "Come." The story closes with Suzanne addressing a note to the financier, couched in the following brief manner: "Come, Suzanne."

THE TRIUMPH OF LOVE (August 8).—An artist falls in love with his sitter, the daughter of a wealthy banker. She scorns his love and he goes away into the country to forget her. He easily does so, for he falls the victim of the charms of a sweet country maid. Then the rich woman realizes that she loves him. She goes to the country hoping to rekindle the old flame in his bosom, but too late; for love triumphs and he prefers his little country bride to the rich woman, who thought to play with his affections.

SHOULD WOMEN WORK? (August 8).—Mr. Proudfoot is suddenly convinced of the fact that there are many, many women in the world working very hard for a living, and he decides that henceforth he will never let a woman work. He goes out and assists every female he meets, but returns later in a different frame of mind having made up his mind that the answer to the question is Yes!

SOLAX.

FOUR FOOLS AND A MAID (August 13).—Mary has four ardent suitors—John, Dick, Tony and Oscar. They all call on the same evening. John comes first bringing candy. When Dick arrives, Mary conceals John, making him into a hall tree with the aid of coat, scarf, hat, etc. Dick just has time to eat some of John's candy before Tony arrives. Against his will, Dick is made into a table while Tony serves as a reclining clair, when Oscar arrives. Oscar sits down on Tony, Tony jumps up, he and Oscar tumble onto Dick, the three bump into John. In the meanwhile, Mary has received a telegram from an old sweetheart, making an appointment at the minister's house to get married, and while our four friends are awaiting her return, we see the marriage performed. When she returns with her husband, our four fools kick themselves with disgust.

A DROP OF BLOOD (August 15).—Bristol Inn is a tavern in a small Western mining town. Brown, the innkeeper, and his wife live at the inn, together with Homeless Mary, a maid of all work. A beggar one day comes to the door, and being refused charity, motions to Brown that he has a letter for him. Brown takes the letter, reads it, and is apparently delighted. He orders wine and cake to be served, and after the beggar departs, shows the letter to his wife, which reads:

Dear Brown:

A gentleman will call at your inn for lodging at about eight o'clock tonight. He carries much money and jewelry with him which perhaps we can land. Yours truly, John Lane.

Mrs Brown also appears pleased, and together they go upstairs to make preparations. While they are thus employed, Mary, the maid, receives a clandestine visit from her lover, John. She soon sends him off, however, fearing a scolding. As he is about to leave, Brown and his wife come downstairs, and Mary is forced to hide John in a small closet. The Browns send Mary to the next town on an errand to get her out of the way. At about eight o'clock, Graham, the expected lodger, arrives. He does not seem very well pleased with the inn, but decides to make the best of it. He eats a little supper, and being very tired decides to retire. As he is about to leave, Mrs. Brown throws a quilt over Graham's head, while Brown himself stabs and instantly kills him.

Meanwhile, John, in the closet, has been waiting for an opportunity to escape, and upon finding that everyone has gone upstairs, decides to leave. Reaching the foot of the stairs on his way to the door, he is startled by a strange sound from above. He stops to listen, and while doing so, a large drop of blood falls on his hand. He is frightened, and runs out to the brook. While running, he is seen by a cowboy and a trapper. The next morning the cowboy happens to be passing the inn and finds Brown and his wife at the door talking very excitedly about the murder. He explains to them that he saw John the night before going towards the brook. At this moment the trapper comes along and confirms the cowboy's statement. John is arrested, tried and convicted. However, visions of the murder constantly bother both Brown and his wife, and very soon remorse overcomes them, and they confess.

SAVED BY THE JUVENILE COURT (3 parts—State Rights).—Through the pitiable destitution of the Rogers family, their fourteen-year-old son, Bob, is compelled to go to the railroad yards and pick coal in order to keep the members of the family from freezing. He is apprehended by a policeman who brings him before Judge Burton to answer to the charge of petty-larceny. Following the time honored method of rigidly interpreting the law, the Judge sentences the little fellow to six months in jail. There he becomes a hardened criminal, being in the company of criminals of all sorts, and when he is released he robs a bank. He and his confederate escape with the money. Being pursued by a posse the culprits take refuge in a shack that is soon set on fire by his pursuers. In the revolver fight that follows, Bob is killed, thus ending a life that might have had a successful career.

This is a short story of the first reel. The second and third reels show in contrast with the first the method of punishment employed by Judge Ben. B. Lindsey, of Denver, Colo. Being reduced to dire straits by the death of her husband, Mrs. Anderson is compelled to take employment of meagre returns. While she is striving to keep herself and her two little children, Charles and Alta, alive, the little ones, not being under the vigilance of their mother, become street waifs, and Charles is arrested for attempted robbery. He is taken before Judge Lindsey who gives him commitment papers and sends him, unattended, to the State Industrial School at Golden, Colo., where he is trained along instructive lines.

In the meantime, Alta, who has been a frequenter of low dance halls, is picked up by a policeman just as she is about to take her first drink. She, too, is taken before Judge Lindsey who cimmits her to the girls' home at Morrison, Colo., where she is educated along lines that will best fit her for life. When the children return home sometime later they are surprised to see that their mother, through the assistance of Judge Lindsey, has opened a bakery shop. Calling upon the Judge, Charles is given employment on the motorcycle brigade of a large department store, and one day while in the discharge of his duties he stops the runaway horse of a banker's daughter. Through his heroism he is given employment by the banker. He is so proficient in his work that he is soon given a confidential position. In time Charles and Beatrice, the daughter, fall in love with each other. Alta, who has been assisting her mother in the bakery, meets Lawrence Riches and after a brief courtship, Judge Lindsey is called upon to officiate at a double wedding.

BELMONT.

THE POLICE INSPECTOR (3 parts—State Rights).—Ethel Clayton, wife of a notorious crook, reads in a newspaper that Mr. and Mrs. Humphrey have purchased a quantity of precious stones and jewelry while abroad and are on their way to a fashionable hotel in America. She calls her husband, points out the newspaper item to him and he immediately packs a valise and goes to the hotel where the tourists are expected. He notices them enter the lobby and after they are assigned to a room, he walks to the register and writes his name. Fortunately for him he is given an adjoining room. He listens and hears that Mr. Humphrey must leave to attend an important business meeting and a few minutes after the husband departs, he raps at the door of their suite and is admitted. Covering Mrs. Humphreys and her maid with his revolver, he gathers up the jewels he finds on the dresser and slips back to his room. The lady and her maid telephone the clerk of the hotel who, in turn, notifies the chief of police. The chief assigns Inspector Hawtrey to capture the thief. Accompanied by four policemen, they make a close scrutiny of the interior and exterior of the hotel. Clayton, hearing the inspector's orders, immediately starts an escape, which means leaping from a window to a fire-escape, down the ladder and a drop of about thirty feet to the walk, rushes to the roadway where he boards an automobile. At the point of his pistol he orders the chauffeur to proceed at breakneck speed after he realizes he is being pursued by a municipal police patrol carrying fifteen policemen. The police inspector sitting beside the driver of the auto patrol is urging him on for more speed, firing at intervals at the fleeing automobile containing the crook. One shot lodges in the tire of the automobile, resulting in the abandonment of the machine and the crook takes to his heels. An exciting chase ensues, resulting in the crook's being tracked to his home and the inspector with his men finding the door locked, shoots the lock away and makes a search of the house. The bandit, upon hearing the shot, escapes to the roof of the house and makes a miraculous leap to an adjoining tree, lowers himself to the ground and rushes away. In his mad rush to escape he dives into an old well. The inspector closely follows, lowers himself to the bottom of the well where a desperate struggle takes place, resulting in the capture of the criminal. Now begins the pursuit of the wife who has flown from the house with the jewels in her possession and after a careful search she is detected hiding in an adjoining cornfield. The inspector promptly carries her to the waiting patrol and the two culprits are sent to the station house. Awaiting news are the frantic husband and wife, and when the inspector enters with the captured criminals and returns the jewels to the rightful owner, joy reigns supreme.

Macomb, Ill., July 28, 1913.

J. H. Genter Co.,
Newburgh, N. Y.

Gentlemen:

I wish to state that I have been ten years in the business, and desire to inform you if any exhibitor desires a screen that will entirely eliminate the peculiar out-of-focus effect so peculiar to other forms of metallic screens, they should install a Mirroroide.

This Mirroroide screen that I obtained from you produces a picture as bright and clear as crystal, in absolute focus, without any glare or eye strain. It also eliminates the rain marks on Commercial film. Another beauty I find with this screen is that the picture is the same at a close and angle view as it is on the back seat. It also eliminates flicker.

You are at liberty to use this any way you see fit, and will be glad to answer any letters that may be sent to me regarding Mirroroide. Thanking you in every way, I remain,

Yours respectfully,
H. B. Franks,
Grand Theater.

In addition we received the following from Mr. G. L. Campbell, 6 Portland Street, Southport, England, dated July 3rd, 1913:

Registered Letter.

Enclosed you will find draft equivalent to 30 pounds. We have a number of your screens in use in England and wish to state this amount is to apply on one Mirroroide screen, 19 x 14, to be shipped to the Picturedrome, Broughton Lane, Manchester, England. Without any question of doubt, Mirroroide is superior to any other form of projection surface now in use in England, and you are at liberty to refer any prospects to us. Mirroroide is all that you claim for it, and the price is such that it brings it within the reach of any and all exhibitors who desire perfect picture projection.

Thanking you for past favors, we remain,

Yours faithfully,
Picturedrome Advertising Co.
G. L. Campbell.

You have heard of the great record we made at the Grand Central Palace. Evidence was had in a fair competitive test. You should desire no more. If you were not there to see these tests, make them yourself! Get our large, free samples. Your eye evidence is conclusive proof. Total output to date, 4,650 screens. To buy the best: Is to Obtain the Best. Our new product: Metalized Glass Bronzes. Demands enormous. Send for a one-half pint can, any color you may desire, postage paid, $1.00.

Sargent's Photoplay Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

Here's a Great Big Live Tip for You. Will You Take Advantage of It?

"I HAVE PLAYED MANY STATE RIGHT FEATURES IN MY THEATRE AND I CAN SAY WITHOUT CONTRADICTION THAT NONE OF THE STATE RIGHT FEATURES HAVE DONE AS WELL FOR MY HOUSE AS THE UNIVERSAL.

James H. Brown, Mgr. Brown's Theatre, San Francisco.

That was an unsolicited statement, and it simply clinched the argument we have been advancing that you are wasting money every time you book a state right feature and pay big money for it.

There isn't a single feature release on the Universal Program that hasn't cost more money and been produced with greater care than any state right feature you can name. Those that have already been released and the long list of money-getters now in preparation are a part of the Universal Program.

This story of adventure, romance and realism is visualized with masterful characterizations, thrill and sensation. The clash of two opposing forces—the nobleman bandit, Brennan (together with the poor whom he patronizes), on one side, and the autocratic and selfish nobility (who gave only at the point of a pistol) on the other—are forces that meet in a succession of blood-stirring and compelling climaxes. Advertising matter includes four kinds of ones, two kinds of threes, sixes; heralds, lobby displays and announcement slides.

Facts and Comments

ALL indications point to a remarkable season of prosperity for exhibitors, exchange men and producers. The season 1913-14 will, we firmly believe, be the biggest in the history of the American kinematograph. This will be due not alone to the fairly good times which the country seems to be enjoying, but in far greater measure to the healthy development and progress of the industry itself. It is difficult to overestimate the growth of the moving picture in the estimation of the public. With all their faults it must be said for the great reputable producers and importers that they have striven after higher ideals. The number of objectionable pictures is constantly on the decrease. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD will surely not be accused of erring on the side of laxity, and we think that the tendency has been toward improvement all around.

This agreeable and profitable state of affairs is in no small part caused by a wholesome self-censorship, which begins before the film is made. Compare the standards of today with the standards of five years ago and note the difference. The morale of the picture is much better today. The foreign producer who looks to the American market has learned his lesson and takes cognizance of American taste and custom. The personnel of the exhibitor has improved markedly, and the heritage of the shooting gallery, the dime museum and cheap shows generally, has been thrown overboard. More men of intelligence and education are coming into the ranks of the industry every day. These latter are in thorough sympathy with the best public taste, and they help to attract the best classes in the community. It really takes very little prophetic power to predict a "bumper crop" for the moving picture industry in 1913-14.

ONE cannot help speculating as to the cause of so many men—eminent men—in the theatrical world getting into dramatic kinematography. Of course, it is impossible to assign just one single cause for this most interesting phenomenon, but it seems to us that the neglect of even the foremost producers to pay a fair compensation to the writers of scenarios has much to do with it. The theatrical magnates and producers really bring nothing with them but a choice assortment of scenarios or plays. All these must be specially arranged and adapted for the screen. If moving picture playwrights of evident talent had received proper encouragement and financial assistance at the hands of the great producers we would have had a splendid series of plays specially designed for the screen and the expensive co-operation and alliance with the theatrical interests would perhaps not have been necessary. Sapienti sat.

ADAPTATIONS from popular operas are always welcome when well done, but great care ought to be taken in the handling of the chorus. In the opera the chorus serves no other purpose than singing. If there are any exceptions to this rule we do not recall them. Adapters of operas for the screen are apt to lose sight of this fact, and often we see the scene crowded with a chorus which, as far as the needs of the silent stage are concerned, might just as well have been omitted.

* * *

A REVIEW of the single and multiple reels issued within the past few weeks reveals a distressing lack of inventiveness and originality. Subjects that have been done scores of times in the past are still prominent. From the synopses of one producer it appears that he has made two reels in the same week which have a striking family likeness. One of the reasons why the multiple reel feature is so popular lies in the fact that the subjects for such multiple reels have not been exhausted or worn threadbare. The public longs for novelty, but novelty may be in the single reel as well as in the multiple.

IT seems to us that all pictures of a distinctly educational value ought to be exempt from any censorship whatever, even from the voluntary censorship of the National Board of Censorship. To run the "imprimatur" of the National Board after such pictures as "Picturesque Jura" or "Battlefields around Chattanooga" or "The Lakes of Salzburg" is simply foolish and makes the judicious grieve. It is also something of an imposition on the exhibitor, who has to pay for so many feet of film waste. Just why producers of such pictures submit them for approval to any body is more than we can grasp at one effort. The audiences in our moving pictures do not take any too friendly to an excess of censorship approvals on the screen. They want to see the pictures, and they fully understand that an approval of scenic and educational releases is "wasteful and ridiculous excess."

A Wondrous Training School

By Louis Reeves Harrison

FOR audience, actor, director and playwright of the future, motion pictures are almost insensibly operating as a training school in all matters pertaining to the stage drama save what is spoken. Public taste is advancing as never before. People must not only be pleased with a performance intended to interest through the mind, but they may enjoy more fully what is presented to them when able to grasp its whole meaning. This involves just such critical discrimination as is being cultivated by daily attendance at the little theaters, whereas, in days gone by, occasional visits to the larger houses were too far apart for deep or lasting effect.

It is on account of this growth of appreciative intelligence that the necessity of "playing down" to those in front will soon cease to be, if it ever had a valid reason for existence. It may have originated with managers who regarded the sale of seats, and consequent prosperity of a theatrical venture, as dependent upon reaching out to the dullest comprehension in the top tier, the very place to which actors oftenest looked for generous applause. It is to people who cannot afford the price of an orchestra chair that moving pictures have made their strongest appeal, and, largely on this account, the average quality of a mixed audience is far above that of former years. It has reached a point where inferior pictures or performances of any kind that are leveled at what is vulgar in the human mind suit only a small, unthinking and diminishing residium.

To achieve a masterpiece for the stage requires so many qualities, such an amount of varied knowledge on the part of an author, that few of natural creative genius seek such an outlet. The chances of failure are large because the work is complicated and the way to recognition beyond the patience of a gifted writer. It is also, incidentally, a costly matter to the producer. Moving pictures afford a less expensive method of trying out a production—one can at least glimpse on the screen what is designed to be shown within the proscenium arch. It would surprise no one if some of the best stage performances of the future grow out of feature presentations in the New Art. These will, however, be designed by dramatists who have mastered the difficult medium of language.

When an interesting story is to be told, the teller very naturally attempts to write a novel, and thus enters the hardest kind of a training school, a form of presentation that is strictly individual, and it is none the less attractive that it cannot be mangled or corrupted by managerial or other desecrating hand. Directly opposed to the view entertained by many theatrical people is the fact that nearly every great playwright was first a poet, novelist, essayist or critic. Some familiarity with the varied uses of human speech once gained, a creative writer may well turn to the drama as a fascinating medium of thought transference, but he must acquire skill in constructing a composition in which the action is swiftly unfolded and the characterization intense, a different art, though closely related to that with which the novelist is conversant.

Several producers, notably the Vitagraph and Edison Companies, have brought forth photodramas by professional writers. The trend is towards original and efficient composers and away from incompetent copyists. Better times are coming for long-suffering audiences of the little theaters, and those capable story-tellers who have become addicted to solitary self-expression in printed form may now attain knowledge of how to visualize their ideas.

Ideas visualized on the screen reach the mind entirely through the eye, and all that pertains to picture sense plays a part, but so much depends upon the performers that their histrionic ability closely corresponds to the author's ability to frame his thought in appropriate words. He must therefore consider them and the fact that he is dealing with a very uncertain quantity. To extract the utmost out of the personality of an actor without surrendering to him means giving him abundant opportunity, for wherever opportunity means intense characterization it is apt, liable and likely to be blue-pencilled by the director.

The director is an important personage. On him rests naturally the guidance and superintendence of production, but the fact that he is very often a combination of bad actor and worse playwright has led him to go beyond general management of what is formulated in the studio for screen presentation into creative realms, with results all-too-painfully obvious in what we are compelled to gaze upon when we go to the picture show. He is slowly but surely settling back upon his main responsibility, very much to the annoyance of those who picked up some easy money in scenario writing.

The director will grow in importance when he confines himself to directing—the biggest men in the business seldom write photodramas and more rarely appear in them. The man who can select types and appropriate backgrounds, who can grasp the full purpose of a talented author and enforce it, is not only headed for leadership in the production of great plays for the screen but for those of the stage—he is surer to attain proficiency in the exercise of what has specially equipped him for his part of the work than by drifting into other fields of effort. It is really up to him to paint the ideal picture with materials others provide.

When author, actor and director come into a harmonious working arrangement we shall have some great modern photodramas; that is, provided suitable inducements are made to enlist the services of the talented writer. The latter will, however, be up against much the same difficulties as those encountered in stage production unless he adapts his work to the requirements of visual presentation. He must consider himself merely an essential part of a composite structure. The real author is a creator of ideas, the director an accomplished illustrator, and his living instruments are human types of intense personality. The director should guide them to the inspiring revelation of what creative genius has to reveal.

The production of motion pictures may easily provide a splendid training for all three, with an ultimate result on the audience of many millions that cannot be other than beneficial. There is stimulus enough in each department to make each of the three sufficient unto itself, but motion pictures cannot, because of their limitations, be the supreme development of dramatic presentation. There is lacking that marvelous instrument for quickening emotion, the human voice. They lack also the full variety and charm of a gifted actor's personality. Those who succeed in them are bound, in the natural course of events, to find their way further along and greatly strengthen that older art in which all arts are intimately associated. What the ultimate achievement will be, no one can tell. That it will be composite, uniting high ability in all departments, no one can doubt. But we are only on our way.

Directing the Educational Moving Picture

By W. Stephen Bush

A FEW days ago, while in conversation with a prominent and successful exchange manager, I remarked that if the schools of the country wanted to introduce a kinematographic course of instruction in any branch whatever they would have to make their own pictures. My friend took emphatic exception to this statement, saying that he had enough educational releases on his shelves to supply the schools of more than one city.

This impression that we are ready to supply just what the schools need in the way of educational pictures, either supplying or supplementing the textbook, is quite general and absolutely erroneous. It is true that we have an array of educational releases which, when properly marshalled in a catalogue, appear quite imposing, but it is also true that not one of these pictures represents a systematic effort to supply a definite series of pictures for a definite purpose.

Take, for instance, geography. We have a very large number of pictures for this branch of instruction, but the proportion and system which are indispensable in all education are missing. Some countries loom up large on the screen, having been visited by the operators of many producers, while other countries are more or less neglected. Something, of course, can be done by trying to classify the materials on hand, but even then the disproportion, which would be fatal to any textbook, becomes apparent and makes the teacher hesitate about using the pictures in connection with a complete course of instruction.

In other words, all educational pictures heretofore made or used have been made or used without definite direction. They resemble the broken volumes of a complete set of books. The broken volumes, to be sure, are interesting enough, but for the purposes of teacher and pupil nothing will do but the complete set. I have encountered this objection whenever I talked of the educative value of the picture with men who are today practically and prominently identified with educational institutions.

"Yes," they would say to me, "we do indeed recognize the tremendous educative value of the film, and to a slight extent we have tested it practically. We agree with you that the film will in the future play as important a part in the educational world as it does now in the field of amusements, but what have you to offer in the way of a definite course in any of the ordinary branches of a grammar school? In which one of the exact sciences have you a set of pictures that will give the pupil a complete course?"

Unless we are prepared to answer these questions satisfactorily we cannot expect to get the motion picture into the schools of the country. The matter of machines and fire regulations is of minor importance. Let us get together and properly prepare and finish just one complete kinematographic course of instruction and the rest will follow. The assistance of a trained and experienced teacher is, of course, indispensable. It is entirely feasible to use a good many of the pictures we have now.

The main thing to bear in mind is this: Before a single inch of film is put into the camera there must be a definite plan, arranged by competent and experienced men. The sole and single purpose of this plan must be to get out a substitute of the textbook. I should not say "a substitute," because the word has come to mean (in the popular mind at least) something inferior, whereas the screen textbook would naturally be superior in every respect to the printed textbook. Now, the plan having been rightly conceived and laid out, must next be carried into execution. An educational picture needs its scenario and its director and its competent camera man quite as much as the most pretentious dramatic release.

As far as I know, no attempt to turn out such kinematographic courses of instruction for the special use of the schools has ever been made, but it must be made before the school and the picture find their true relation to one another. The preparation of the educational scenario, if I may be permitted to carry the analogy with the drama a little further, will be a matter of great importance and difficulty, and will require the services of an experienced and highly trained teacher, while the execution will need the best efforts of a very capable camera man. The better these two men will understand each other the more perfect will be their co-operation and the more satisfactory will be the results of their labor. If a man can be found who unites in himself the qualities of a first-class camera man and a born pedagogue, great things may be expected immediately. It may well be doubted whether such a man exists among us today, but it is a safe prediction to say that he will come in the not too distant future. We surely do not have to wait for him, however; the time to begin is long past due.

I earnestly hope that our producers will take the lead in giving the world the educational picture properly prepared and properly directed. Kinematography all over the world looks to the American producers for examples and "leads." At the present time the American producer contributes comparatively little to the supply of educational releases, as I have endeavored to point out in another article. Here, then, is a magnificent opportunity to regain a lost advantage and to set a great example to producers all over the world. In the introduction of such pictures into the schools the American producer has an inestimable advantage over his European fellow-worker. He will encounter far less prejudice and far less red tape. Before any part of any European government can be got into motion a fearful amount of inertia and stupidity must be overcome. Despite all claims to the contrary, and despite the idea that in Europe educational methods are more scientific than here, the fact remains that the European educators are still largely under the influence of the Chinese idea. Innovation terrifies them; they cannot give to the new idea that unbiased and favorable hearing of which the humblest individual is always sure on this side of the water.

From all of which it appears plainly enough that the opportune moment for this highly important work has arrived and Invitation Knocking at the Door should no longer be kept waiting.

Every detail must be watched by expert eyes. A great lot of editing is necessary. A film which is to be used for the instruction of advanced pupils is one thing and a film to be used in elementary schools is quite another thing. Just as there are different textbooks for various grades from the A-B-C class to the university, so there must be different film editions of the same subject. This is not the place to go into the advantages of kinematographic instruction generally, but it must be apparent at once that such kinematographic courses of instruction do not alone teach more easily and thoroughly; they save a vast amount of valuable time—a very important factor to the pupils as well as to the teachers.

Two Interesting Vitagraphs

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

JAMES YOUNG, who has produced bright stories for both stage and screen, whose appearance with Clara Kimball Young in any sort of play is a signal for the audience to sit up and take notice, is responsible for two reels of amusement dealing with the question of woman's suffrage in which the ladies utilize an ingenious device to carry an important election. Without resorting to bribery, ballot-box stuffing or intimidation, prerogatives of manhood, they carry their point and win the election by an overwhelming majority.

It all comes about through the joyous personality of Sidney Drew as Grand Marshall of the woman's parade. He goes in swimming, and some small boys hide his clothes. His antics with the only tangible cover for his nudity suggests an idea to Jimmy Young, who is under pledge to carry the town for the ladies in opposition to the married men and the leading paper edited by his own father. At a mass meeting of the married women he suggests to the wives that they make it impossible for their husbands to visit the polls by depriving them of their trousers. We see this done in the still hours of the night and the clothing shops are raided by other gentle ones to buy up every pair of pants in the place. The few men who do appear in abbreviated garments and make-shifts are run in as disorderly persons.

All comedy of character that is brought out is good, and many of the incidents will win a laugh, but there are a few little features, such as tumbling down, which belong to a past decade. It is just as well to avoid the extravagant—it may have the appearance of being forced—and tell the story in action with the appearance of versimilitude, create humorous characters rather than exaggerated caricatures. It is betrayal of purely human weakness of character that brings the spontaneous laugh and remains in memory after the play has been seen.

"The Lost Millionaire," Two-Reel Drama.

"The Lost Millionaire" is a fascinating story. To watch it is like reading a good novel. It completely absorbs attention from beginning to end and fully justifies the use of an expedient which the dramatist is compelled to employ for swift presentation of the phase of human nature which might be defined as "reversion to a former state of mind." I refer to mental lapse from shock and subsequent recovery by means of suggestion, the essential feature of "Mother Love" and other successful photodramas otherwise wholly different from one another in plot and action.

There is not room enough ordinarily in a drama to otherwise account for this returning to a previous condition, and as it permits the exhibition of original or more natural characteristics after these have been artificially modified or lost—it permits the playwright to set up some powerful situations. A thousand interesting plays could be written with this feature embodied and each present some delightful variations. In this particular case a really fine story would drag without the incident that converts the millionaire a plain ordinary man until he finds a woman well worth while, one of pure character and high motive. There is fine motive and sympathetic sweetness throughout the story and some exceptionally good characterization.

Lincoln's acting as the young millionaire is without flaw. More intense is that of Anita Stewart. Her work is replete with tiny expressions and movements that show intelligent comprehension of what is to be done and ability to do it. One great fault in her impersonation deserves remark because it can be avoided in the future. Her makeup is not altogether artistic. She plays the part of a mountain girl long exposed to the elements by life in the open, and she constantly appears in exteriors with a snow-white skin, very lovely in a drawing room, but wholly out of place in the life she is supposed to lead. Charles Kent is superb in his role of the mountaineer, her father. These two are so convincing in all that they do that I may safely say it has never been done better on the screen, but he also, falls for too much paint. The studio habit of blacking the eye-hollows makes characters ghastly in the open. Faint shadows only are permissable.

The whole play is not, however, marred by these details. It is a fine production and will win its way to all hearts.

FROM THE VITAGRAPH WESTERN STUDIO.

A new play by Miss G. A. Pierce has just been sent east for release from the Vitagraph western studio. It is a psychological drama having as its motif the regeneration of a fallen woman. There is an open-air revival meeting in which the heroine, much in need of grace, gets religion. Anne Schaeffer, for whom the part was written, portrayed it skillfully under the directorship of Manager R. S. Sturgeon.

George C. Standley, one of the original Vitagraph Westerners, is righty proud of his interpretation of the dual roles in "The Two Brothers." He did energetic work, no doubt, during the play's production, but not quite so lively as a lady in the audience where the picture was lately shown apparently thinks. "Huh!" she cried, "They can't make me believe one man acts both those parts, he just couldn't change his clothes that fast."

* * *

There's a new leading lady at the Vitagraph Western, who made her debut upon the stage of life at Manager Sturgeon's home on July 23rd. The baby is beautiful, the father improving and everybody happy.

* * *

The studio at Santa Monica is now complete. It looks like business when upon the big out-door stage three directors —R. S. Sturgeon, Robert Thornby, and W. J. Bauman are producing, three cameras grinding, and three companies doing their durndest for art's sake. It keeps the scenario department, with W. H. Durham, Mary H. O'Connor, and Daisy E. Smith before the machines, humming.

"For the Flag" (American)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

THERE has been a surfeit of Civil War dramas in the market for some time past—some of them good, some bad and others indifferent. Playing with tin soldiers is not often a pleasant occupation, especially from the viewpoint of the looker-on. When I first heard the title "For the Flag," as applied to the American's two-reel feature that will be released August 25, I murmured to myself, "Still another of them," and bowed resignedly to fate. Lorimer Johnson, however, had a surprise in store for me. He had jumped the well beaten track in Dixie land and brought me in close contact with fighting as it is done by Uncle Sam's regulars and bolo men in the Philippines. He also gives one a peep behind the scenes at life as it may be in the officers' quarters in these modern days.

Scene from "For the Flag" (American).

The production of these films required much careful rehearsal, and to the credit of Mr. Johnson it must be said that little fault can be found because of a lack of soldierly deportment. Great care is evident all through in the selection of uniforms, etc., and the scenic exteriors have been very happily chosen. The scenes showing the reception at the Governor's residence and the attack on the home of Juanita by the insurrectos reveal picturesqueness and fine acting. The hand-to-hand conflict with the bolo men is savage in its ferocity, and the melee must have resulted in some bad bruises and cuts on the bodies of the pantomimic fighters. An interior that calls for special mention is that showing the courtmartial of Lieut. Bronson. The atmosphere of stern and dignified bearing on the part of the officers engaged is impressive.

Scene from "For the Flag" (American).

Under the supervision of Director Johnson, the members of the cast do excellent work. I can't remember having seen J. Warren Kerrigan in any part in which he has appeared to such fine advantage as in the role of Lieut. Jack Bronson. He is the typical well bred West Pointer, zealous of his honor and of the good name of women, and a perfect fire-eater when it comes to fighting. It may not be conducive to "the good of the service" that a junior officer should be seen trouncing his superior on two different occasions, but the spectator loses sight of army discipline under the circumstances, and feels inclined to yell, "Give him another." Jack Richardson appears in one of his strongest characterizations as Captain Williams, and George Periolat gives another strong character sketch in the part of Colonel Graham. Miss Vivian Rich is a captivating Juanita, and Miss Louise Lester, as is her wont, furnishes fine character work as Juanita's lady companion.

Lieut. Jack Bronson, having received his commission, gives a farewell dinner to his friends before leaving for the West to join his troop. Soon after his arrival at the western station, he is placed under arrest and held for courtmartial on the charge of striking Captain Williams, of his troop. The Colonel's wife has been the cause of it. Jack loses his commission and is discharged from the army.

He buys a ticket for the Philippines, and arriving there enlists as a private under another name. Soon afterwards his old troop arrives from the States, and Captain Williams, on seeing Jack at drill, calls him up and charges him with being Jack Bronson. Jack simply replies, "I am not the man."

Soon afterwards Jack renders a service to Juanita, a Spanish heiress, when she sprains her ankle on the beach and wins her gratitude. Captain Williams has selected her for his own. One evening, at the Governor's reception, Jack is on duty at the mansion. Juanita speaks to him as an equal and is detected by Captain Williams. The Captain attempts to use violence on the girl, when private Jack Bronson rushes to her aid and fells his superior officer. Then he flies for his life and is sought for as a deserter, who will be shot on his arrest.

After much tribulation Jack succeeds in arriving at Juanita's home one night, when the insurrectos are about to make an attack. The Governor and the people in his residence flee to Juanita's home as better fitted to sustain the attack. Jack makes himself known to the Governor and voices the request, "Let me fight for the flag now, then do with me what you may." He fights so valorously and so scathlessly, that the Governor, when the fight has been won, says, as he grasps his hand. "I promise you will be pardoned and restored to rank." The final scene shows the duenna placing Juanita's hand in that of Jack.

GEORGE TERWILLIGER CAN SWIM?

George Terwilliger of the Lubin scenario department is receiving a free course of stenography and a new typewriter as the result of a wager with Emmett Campbell Hall, another Lubin dopester, to swim across the Schuylkill River at the point where it runs through the Lubin Farm at Betzwood.

On he strength of his victory the scenario doctor is scheduled to race Howard M. Mitchell for championship honors of Lubinville.

Terwilliger, who is termed "The Shakespeare of the Silent Drama," had been under the Lubin banner only a comparatively short time and already has several winners to his credit. Some of them are: "The District Attorney's Conscience," "Dregs," "The Burning Rivet," "The Benefactor," "The Angel of the Slums," "Love of Beauty," "When the Heart Changes," and "The Man in Him."

The Fight for Right

A Reliance Two-Part Subject Written by James Oppenheim Dealing With the Problem of Prison Labor.

STUDENTS of penology will find some assistance in their fight for better conditions in state prisons in the dissemination of the Reliance two-part dramatic subject entitled "The Fight for Right," a picture dealing with the prison labor question, the story of which was written by James Oppenheim, who is said to have made a study of the subject. So satisfactory does this picture depict the conditions complained of that the National Committee of Prison Labor has given it an unqualified endorsement. The picture was directed by Oscar Apfel and, for the most part, has been effectively portrayed. A notable cast assisted Mr. Apfel in his task. Rosemary Theby takes the part of Mary Durland, daughter of a politician who enters into a contract to employ prison labor in the manufacture of knit goods, and Irving Cummings appears as John the young mechanic who is in love with Mary, but who is seriously affected by the action of Mary's father in employing prison labor. Ralph Lewis portrays Durland, the politician and employer of prison labor.

Scene from "The Fight for Right" (Reliance).

The scene of the story is a southern mill town, of which a knitting company is the principal industry. This company is suddenly compelled to close its works because Durland has made a contract with the prison authorities to put in a knitting plant and the company which employs free labor cannot compete with the prison product. John and his brother Joe are thrown out of work and hard pressed for money to procure medicine for their mother who is taken ill. In this extremity Joe attempts to rob the safe of Durland, the cause of his trouble, but is caught in the act and sent to prison where he is put to work on Durland's knitting machines.

Mary has gone to boarding school where she learns something of sociology. When she returns home she decides to take up the study of prison reform and in her first attempts at investigation discovers the troubles of her lover, John, and the plight of his brother who is in the prison hospital as a result of the brutal treatment received at the hands of the slave-driving prison guards. John has already taken up the fight of the labor unions against prison contract labor and he finds an enthusiastic supporter in Mary.

Mary makes a trip North to study prison conditions where the convicts are employed in work that does not bring them into competition with free labor and where stripes are not worn by the unfortunate prisoners, and returns home determined to accomplish something. She invites John to her home to discuss plans for the work to be done, but the young folks are soon discussing their own future. Mary's father arrives just in time to find her in John's embrace and when he discovers the identity of John there is a scene in which Mary learns that it is her father who is to blame for her lover's troubles and that it is his interests she is fighting. But Mary defies the stern parent and sticks to John and her chosen mission.

Together the young people secure the introduction and passage of a legislative enactment to put a stop to prison contract labor and the father, beaten at his own game of politics, surrenders unconditionally, tearing up his prison contract and accepting John as his son-in-law.

Astute politicians will criticise the methods adopted by John and Mary to introduce and secure the passage of their bill. The sight of Durland openly producing his check book in the corridor of the state capitol to buy the defeat of the bill is crude and the production of John's brother Joe, a physical wreck as the result of his prison experience, to turn the tide of defeat to victory is somewhat spectacular and rather unusual; these things are not done that way. But the work of the principals is good throughout the picture and it is one that will command attention even though the love affair of John and Mary does overshadow the sought for lesson.

Dr. Nicholson and the Blue Diamond

"Film Releases of America" Sends Out Its First Picture, a Four Reel, Sensational Story of the "Zigomar" Kind.

By H. C. Judson.

THE first of the Dansk Kinograph films, which are to be marketed in America by The Film Releases of America Company, under the wing of the Exclusive Supply Corporation, has been shown to a number of newspaper men and will be released on August Twenty-first. It is a four reel offering with a detective story not unlike "Zigomar." It is smaller in pattern and not so lavishly put on, nor can the two be compared in acting or in construction. Yet in this picture there is a good measure of suspense; it also has its fine scenes; its thrilling adventures in which the actors didn't spare themselves, and, not the least of its assets, a pleasing love story. Clear photography is also one of its strong points. It is just the picture to satisfy spectators that they have been well entertained for their money and chiefly because of the love story which is of the enjoyable "pipe dream" kind, a kind that is especially effective in pictures.

Scene from "Dr. Nicholson and the Blue Diamond."

The scenes were very plainly made in Denmark and the sub-titles keep saying that the backgrounds are New York; but this little naivete one soon gets used to. In these sub-titles, as they were shown, there are peculiar uses of English which are more hampering to our impression of the action; but these, we understand, are to be changed and corrected. The action has its reason of being in two facts: (a) An American girl is left a big fortune, including a monster blue diamond, to be hers on her wedding day. She has her agent advertise for a man who will go through a legal marriage, the present sub-title calls it a "mock marriage," in order that she may get her money, and with the stipulation that, at the end of a month, in which the two will appear to the world to be living together, she shall get a divorce and be free. The second fact is: (b) Dr. Nicholson, a Zigomar-like robber, wants to get the diamond and tries to make a cat's-paw of a young nobleman who is in New York without money and unable to get work, by setting him up as a candidate for the legal, dummy marriage.

This evil character is the picture's titular role and in him, though not so strong a character as Zigomar, it has a good figure. Dr. Nicholson's powers for evil are not shown by what he does in the action, but by what he has done in the past, before the story opens. They are made plain through the suggestions given by the mechanical protection he has constructed and invented to make it impossible for the police to surprise him at his home. The fact is that, while he is a clever burglar, in nothing else does he show mental vigor above the ordinary. With the help of his mechanisms he does create a feeling of mystery and of unearthly powers which is all that is ever required of such a character.

The girl is attractive in her self and we have no fault to find with her playing. The sets that show her home and the backgrounds that give us glimpses of its piazzas and drives are very good indeed; they suggest that gracious refinement and comfort that make the life she lives desirable. They give her the proper setting for a "pipe dream" romance. The young nobleman is found by one of the doctor's factotums and, before he has met the girl or knows anything about her, he is persuaded to marry her and get the blue diamond for the doctor. The wedding has been performed and the nobleman has a room in the girl's mansion. She is very pleasant to him and they are friends. She has shown him where the gems are kept. When the doctor's first note comes demanding the diamond, the nobleman tears it up and, later, defies the redoubtable man to his face when he calls.

There is now open war between the doctor and the young man who has employed a detective to help him. The doctor tries to rob the house while the man and his legal wife are out together and fails. He then sends word that, unless the diamond is delivered, the house will be blown up. The detective and the man are searching through the mansion for the bomb while we watch the hands of the clock creep toward the time decreed. There are only two minutes left when a ticking is heard and this leads to the discovery of an infernal machine. The explosion takes place before the bomb can be thrown into the lake near the house and, the detective being shocked by it, the nobleman is captured and taken to the home of the criminals where he is secured in an underground dungeon. Yet he manages to work his way almost to freedom. By this time, the doctor, who had given himself an injection of chloral, has found that he is able to get the gem without the help of others. When the hero works his way out to the inner office the diamond is there and is flaunted in his sight. After teasing him a bit, the doctor calls his servants and has the prisoner taken to a bridge and thrown, foot-bound, into the sea. From this he is rescued by two fishermen and comes back to the heroine.

The villain thinks himself secure and permits a dancing woman to wear the diamond for her performance, the season's opening. The hero and the heroine are in a box and, during the graceful dance, notice the diamond and also get a glimpse of the doctor in a box opposite. This he also sees and has a moment in which to escape; but the detective, passing on the street, recognizes him. The detective has an adventure with him on board a fast train, but secures the diamond though he has to let the criminal escape. Then there are, as a close, a few pretty love scenes that are very acceptable. It is naturally and skillfully acted and there is much beauty of scenery in it.

Edward Warren Leaves Solax

One of the best known directors in the business is Edward Warren, for the past two years general director of the Solax Company at Fort Lee, N. J. A month ago Mr. Warren tendered his resignation to the Solax in order to accept a contract from the directors of the National Boy Scouts of America to produce a picture showing the general activities of the Boy Scouts. Mr. Warren's work for the Boy Scouts was completed in two weeks, and in that time he turned out the first seven reel picture that has ever been made in America. For this work he received a large sum of money and retained a fourth interest in the exhibition profits. There is a well defined story running through the picture which was written by the producer.

Edward Warren.

During his two years with the Solax Mr. Warren produced more than 150 single reel pictures, and many of the features, prominent among which are; "The Sewer," "The Equine Spy," and "Brennan of the Moor," "Kelly from the Emerald Isle" and "Beasts of the Jungle." Lest there be any misunderstanding, Mr. Warren desires us to state that he left the Solax on the best of terms with the management. He entertains the same high regard for Mr. and Mrs. Blache that he has always had for them and as an evidence of that fact he states that Solax is now doing the laboratory work on the Boy Scout picture.

Prior to joining Solax, Mr. Warren had been an actor and producer in theatrical work for upwards of 20 years. He has been associated with such well known people as Daniel Frohman, Annie Russell, Lillian Russell, Viola Allen, Robert Mantell, Fanny Davenport, Mme. Rhea, Arthur Rehan, and others. Mr. Warren is now open for offers and may be addressed at 100 Morningside Drive, New York City.

JACK LONDON CLOSES BALBOA COMPANY.

Sydney Ayers, who is associated with Jack London in the production of pictures from London's stories, writes that the contract previously made with the Balboa Amusement Producing Company and H. H. Hockheimer, its president, has been terminated and that the pictures proposed will be made and released by some other concern.

The Diamond Makers

A Rex Two-Reel Detective. Story.

Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman.

IF the chemical manufacture of diamonds is an unlawful procedure, this picture may be consistent. The spectator is called upon at the beginning to decide this question for himself. We have in it the proposition of an old Hindoo alchemist who has devoted a lifetime to the production of artificial diamonds, and who at a very advanced age succeeds in producing something that closely resembles a diamond. Whether or not it is a real diamond is not explained, but inasmuch as the agents who attempt to market the old man's product are hounded by detectives, it is reasonable to suppose that the stones are spurious and that they are obtaining money under false pretenses.

Scene from "The Diamond Makers" (Rex).

The story begins as the old Hindoo discovers the trick of turning out a perfect stone. He is a fanatic on Buddhism and beseeches the high priest of the faith to send agents to America to sell the diamonds and devote the proceeds to the rehabilitation of the Buddhist religion throughout the world. The high priest sends the high priestess (Margarita Fischer), with two native attendants to America. We are to assume also that the high priestess understands the English language and American ways perfectly, because immediately after discarding her Oriental garb for Occidental raiment, she becomes a typical self-reliant American girl in appearance and manner. She is not embarrassed in the least and proceeds to sell her wares with the assurance of a book agent.

KIMBERLY
INTERES

Scene from "The Diamond Makers" (Rex).

It is probable that the stones are not genuine because the "Kimberly" diamond concern sets the great detective, Felix Westerly (Robert Leonard), on the track of the diamond sellers.

From this point the picture takes on a decidedly melodramatic form. It is an exciting game of wits between the high priestess and the sleuth, with alternating success, and sprinkled profusely with gasps. The excitement of the hunt is sufficient to make one forget the shortcomings of the picture, but there are a few shortcomings, which fortunately can be overcome by the insertion of an extra sub-title now and then, to allow the spectator to get his bearings. The Universal is usually pretty good at accepting hints of this kind, and no doubt something will be done to relieve the geographical and personal indefiniteness of this offering.

As an instance; while the Hindoo diamond sellers are operating in America, the scene suddenly shifts to a distinctly Oriental interior, with all the characters attired in Hindo garb. It appears later that they are still in America and that this is their rendezvous, but the poor spectator finds himself wondering whether or not the whole crew have taken a sudden trip back to the Orient. This can easily be remedied by a sub-title. Then again; at the beginning of the picture we have reason to suppose we are in India. There is correspondence enough to show that America is somewhere else. We see the old alchemist at his furnace, and naturally suppose that it is located in India, perhaps quite near the palace of the high priest. Later, when the detectives raid the diamond plant we find the very same furnace and laboratory in America. It may be that the furnace is supposed to be in America all the time, but this point is not clear, and a simple sub-title would readily settle the doubt. Perhaps the high priest is supposed to reside in America. Who knows?

The picture is full of quick detective stuff and clever getaways. It is highly exciting. One poor fellow gets burned to death on a live wire. The old alchemist blows up his furnace and takes his life rather than reveal his secret. Escapes are made by means of roofs, panel doors, automobiles, yachts, and other things. Margarita Fischer as an Oriental woman is superb. Bob Leonard makes a very convincing detective and is highly acceptable in the part. He bagged the whole gang and then fell in love with the priestess, but, as Joe Brandt or Rudyard Kipling might say, "that's another scenario."

The photography is clear but somewhat harsh. The close-to-the-camera work is considerably overdone. About half the picture is done this way, for no very good reason. Outside of these few faults the picture is all right and will probably get by very nicely by virtue of its thrilling episodes.

EDISON STUDIO NOTES.

Charles Sutton, who has played important parts in Edison films for several years, does a powerful piece of character work as the hunchback in "The Rightful Heir."

Frank McGlynn, late of the Chicago production of "Officer 666," by the power of his acting, made his return to Edison films felt at once.

Ben Wilson has been doing capital work opposite Mary Fuller in several recent Edison releases, notably "The Robbers" and "The Romance of Rowena." We also find this talented actor playing the hero in the first of the new "Mary" stories.

Dan Mason, the well-known character comedian who will be remembered in "The Man from Mexico," "Why Smith Left Home," "The Prince of Pilsen," "It Happened in Nordland" and numerous other big successes, is enthusiastic over his affiliation with the Edison Company. He created some amusement in his first picture by retiring to one corner of the studio when the director had outlined the first scene. He seemed wrapped in a brown study for several moments and when asked the meaning of his retirement, explained that he was thinking out his character. The result was his clever portrayal of "Professor William Nutt," which amply justified his "brown study" methods.
